ple of the country for the support of this class?

Sir, I know that it is perfectly useless to appeal to the Constitution of the United States. It is a dead letter. It has no more weight or consideration in the legislation of Congress, in my judgment, than any other piece of printed matter. Not only are the negroes of the South set free, by which the object and the aim of all the abolitionists in the land was accomplished as we supposed, but a bill is passed by Congress conferring upon them all civil rights enjoyed by white citizens of the country, and they are now selected out from among the people of the United States, the public Treasury put at their disposal, and the white people of the country taxed for their support. Lands to which you claim title by virtue of a purchase under a tax sale, lands, therefore (if you have the title) of the United States, you take and give to the negroes in South Carolina. You give these lands to no white person. If it be said that it is not an absolute gift, you may make money of it, the answer is that you say you sell them to negroes for $1 50 an acre. If you have the title to these lands, what is the reason that you select out the negro race and fix the price at $1 50 an acre, when, if your title be perfect, you can command perhaps fifty or one hundred dollars an acre for these cotton lands? If it was proper to make the remark in the Senate of the United States, I could say that you could have a purchaser without going out of the Senate at ten dollars an acre, taking the whole of them, every acre of the sixty-odd thousand acres which you propose to sell to these negroes at $1 50 an acre. If you have the title to these lands, that is the way you propose to dispose of them at a nominal price to the negro race.

Mr. President, I shall attempt no review of the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau. I never believed that Congress had any right to establish any such bureau to take under its charge any particular portion of the people of the United States and to provide for them out of the public Treasury or out of the public lands. Such legislation was unknown in the early history of the Government, unknown until these extraordinary times; but, sir, it seems that we have become so much wiser than our fathers that we have discovered new principles of government, and have found somewhere within our legislative power the authority to become guardians for four million negroes.

Mr. President, there is one aspect of this case, and it will apply to many other cases that come before Congress, that it is time for the American people to begin to consider. If there is anything in private life to which I am opposed; if there is anything that I would oppose as a legislator, it is the repudiation of a debt. I do not believe in the repudiation of a private debt, and I do not believe in the repudiation of a public debt. This species of legislation taxes an unwilling people to support negroes in idleness, gives away your lands, if they be your lands, to negroes, that they may live in idleness upon them; deprives citizens of the United States of their title to lands contrary to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that they shall not be so divested except by due process of law. Pile up your public debt until it becomes so onerous that the people cannot and will not further bear it, and there are men in this country so anxious for political power, so anxious for political promotion that they will start a party in this country to wipe out that debt and get clear of the burden which you wish to impose upon them. I do not wish to see this; I wish to see the national faith and the national honor maintained; but, sir, there is a limit to oppression and there is a limit to taxation beyond which the people will not suffer. Already, not in the South, for I have seen no indications from that quarter of any intention to repudiate this debt, but I will tell you, sir, that now, in your own free States, there are men, in my judgment, who would hail the day when your public debt—at least so much of it as has accrued from the appropriation of money to support these negroes in idleness—there are men, I say, who would gladly see that portion of the public debt wiped out.

This may be plain talk. No man can charge me with a design or a purpose or a wish that such should be the case; but you must know that men are governed by interest. Your public debt is now over $3,000,000,000. You have added to it enormously during the present session. You propose to continue taxes upon the people of the United States to support this Freedmen's Bureau for two years longer, and what will be the amount of expenditure under this bill no one can tell. The Commissioner may appoint just as many agents as he pleases, at a salary of not less than $500 each. It is impossible, therefore, for you to determine the amount of expenditure that will take place under this bill. It is so much more needlessly added to your public debt.

Why, sir, it seems to me that we have got to conclude that there is no end to the resources of this country or the ability of the people to pay taxes. It used to be that a public debt of $100,000,000 was considered a great burden. An annual expenditure for the purposes of Government of fifty or sixty or seventy-five million dollars was considered such a wasteful expenditure of the public money that when you met in Chicago in 1860 you proclaimed yourselves the friends of retrenchment and reform, and were going to administer this Government upon more economical principles, at a less expenditure than it had been administered theretofore. And yet, sir, in the five or six years you have been in power you have piled up a debt of some five thousand million dollars. You yourselves admitted, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the House at the commencement of the session admitted that the public debt was $4,000,000,000 and more, and you are levying taxes upon the people of the country to pay the interest upon this enormous debt, and you propose to pay a portion of the principal. Where is the money to come from? There is taxation burdensome, onerous, upon all classes of the community, a stamp upon everything, the necessities of life two or threefold higher in price than heretofore, and you suppose the people of this country are so absolutely demented that for mere love of the idle, worthless negro race they are going to submit to all this burden of taxation, and that this false philanthropy, the parent of idleness and vagabondism as far as that race is concerned, is going to wait you again into the seats of power and that a tax-ridden and tax-burdened people are going to hail you as the great party to save the country upon the principles of liberty and there to meet you with hosannas wherever you bear your partisan standards and cast their votes to continue you in the high places of power.

Sir, there are periods in the history of the world, of all nations and people, when madness seizes upon the mind, when the judgment flies to brutish beasts. We have for a long time been in that situation, passing through it, in it, however, still; but, thank God, the symptoms of a political and a bright dawning begin to appear. The people of this country at least are beginning to wake up to the true character of this legislation. Sirs, you sit not quietly in your seats; you are not entirely calm when you can be so alarmed at the call for a little meeting in Philadelphia. It shows that you yourselves begin to think that there is something in your past political action that the judgment of the American people may not approve. You cannot pretend now that we are in the midst of a war. You cannot set up that plea of necessity, the last refuge of every man without any legal authority to support his action. You cannot set up such a plea as that, and say that there is any necessity for this Freedmen's Bureau. When the people of this country are called upon for their taxes, which, in part, are to be appropriated to the support of this Freedmen's Bureau, you cannot plead that we are now in a state of war and it is necessary to break down the military power at the South;

it is necessary to preserve the integrity of the country; for I presume that in view of your legislation you yourselves will even now blush to say that you ever have preserved the American Union. You can plead none of these things. It is a direct, plain, palpable proposition to the American people to put their hands in their pockets, pull out the earnings of their labor, and appropriate them to support the negroes in idleness. It seems to me that you believe sincerely and honestly that they will respond to such a call as that.

But, Mr. President, there is a feature in this bill that undertakes to declare and almost undertakes to say that that shall be so which cannot in the very nature of things be so. This bill says that these agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, these guardian angels of the saintly negroes, these protectors of the idols of your heart, shall be under the military protection and subject to the military jurisdiction of the United States. What are they? Are they persons belonging to the Army or Navy of the United States? And can you by act of Congress say that A B, who in fact is in civil life, shall for certain purposes be considered as belonging to the military service? If you can say that the agents of this Freedmen's Bureau, who cultivate the cotton lands of the South by negro labor for their own benefit, and who dispense your alms to those freed negroes, shall be under the military jurisdiction and protection of the United States, you may say that every member of this Senate and every private citizen of the United States shall be subject to the military protection and under the military jurisdiction of the United States; that he shall be protected by and have a remedy by and through the military power of the United States. How, sir, do you reconcile that with the Constitution of the United States, which declares that all civilians shall be subject to the civil law, and that only those persons who are engaged in the land and naval forces shall be subject to the military jurisdiction of the United States?

An attempt is made by this bill, therefore, to subvert a plain, palpable provision of the Federal Constitution by rendering civilians subject to military jurisdiction and affording them military protection. And what will be the consequence of this? If one of these agents, clothed with a little brief authority, dares to invade the right of any citizen of any State in which he shall be located, and the citizen seeks redress in the courts of law against him, you say by your bill that he shall be subject to the military jurisdiction and have the protection of the military power. You bring him in direct conflict with the civil authority of the States wherever any branch of this Freedmen's Bureau shall be located. He is to be protected by the military authority of the United States, and you exempt him in fact from trial for any wrong whatever, murder, breach of the peace, or any crime that can be committed. You exempt the party committing such offenses from responsibility to the civil tribunals. Some little military hero, who perhaps has never smelled gunpowder in battle, but who has been placed in charge of this Freedmen's Bureau, is to step in and say to the highest courts in the States and to the highest civil authority, "You shall not take cognizance of offenses against the laws, for I am the great man, above the State law and all State authority, that is to determine whether this one of the pet lambs of congressional legislation shall be held amenable for his action or not."

This provision of this bill is totally subversive of the civil law of the land, and it is subjecting the civil authority in time of peace to the military authority. But, sir, that is not all. There is another provision of this bill. It used to be thought that it required many years of long labor and study to become a judge. It used to be a maxim that twenty years at least were required; but, sir, you are making judges fast. These commissioners and agents are by the provisions of this bill actually constituted judges—men who neither know the definition of an estate for life, for years, or in fee, who know nothing in the world about land except they see the dirt of which it is composed and the vegetation that springs out of the ground. They are made judges, and judges in reference to title to lands, and judges, too, from whose decision there is to be no appeal. This bill expressly declares that these commissioners and agents shall determine the title to lands, and it gives no appeals from their very learned and grave decision. Any ignoramus that has never seen a law book, and perhaps if he ever saw one could not read it, and every fellow who never conceived a principle of law or a principle of justice, is to sit in solemn judgment in reference to the title to estates, and from his decision no aggrieved party can appeal.

Mr. President, I question not the motives of others; I have no right to question them; but I have a right to speak my own honest opinions, and I think that the wit of man could not have framed a bill obnoxious to more serious objections in point of law than this bill to extend the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau; and certainly if it had been the design to frame a bill impolitic in its character, unwise in its provisions, ingenuity could not have possibly devised a bill to accomplish such a purpose more effectually than this. But, Mr. President, it is a foregone conclusion that this bill is to pass. A war, it seems, has been got up between the President of the United States and another portion of his party. The hostile armies on either side are arrayed. I will not be even a private in the ranks of either. I support the President wherever I believe he is right, and I oppose him where ever I believe he is wrong; and while I believe that you by your legislation are greatly promoting his political interests, and peradventure may lead to a renewal of his term of office, yet I claim not to belong to his party nor to yours—neither detachment nor wing of the party. But, sir, it seems this war has been got up, feeling has been engendered; and then when the President of the United States sends in a message assigning the strongest possible reasons why your bill should not become a law of the land, the bill must be fought out on this line though it takes all summer—no truce, no cessation of hostilities. All I have got to say is, keep on if you think there is no hereafter. It will not be long before the American people will decide upon the merits of this controversy. Passion is not going to last always; men are not going to be maddened always; the time for clear deliberation and calm thoughtfulness will come at last, and, when it does come, I apprehend the reaction will be as powerful as was the invasion of constitutional liberty and constitutional principles by the now dominant party.

The people of this country will not always submit to this species of legislation, but resorting to the peaceful method of the ballot-box, tired of the control and mismanagement of a party that keeps one third of this Union practically out of the Union, which shuts the halls of legislation against the representatives of eleven States of the Union, and assumes to legislate not only for the States they represent but for those who are denied a voice in the councils of the nation, the time will come, I humbly hope and believe, when the American people, aroused to a sense of their own dignity and their own character and their own interests will, by filling these Halls with representatives of their will, forever put an end to this species of legislation and again restore the Government to the principles upon which it was administered by the founders of the Republic.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President notwithstanding? This question, under the Constitution, will be taken by yeas and nays.

The question being taken, resulted—yeas 53, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Van Winkle—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cowan, Dixon, Lane of Kansas, and Wright—4.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two thirds of this body have passed the bill, and it having been certified to this House that two thirds of the House of Representatives have voted for this bill, the objections of the President notwithstanding, and two thirds of this body having also voted for the bill, after reconsideration, the objections of the President notwithstanding, I now pronounce that this bill has become a law.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 222) further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The message also announced that the House agreed to some, disagreed to others, and agreed with amendments to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 387) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867; asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and appointed Mr. J. A. KASSON of Iowa, Mr. W. E. NIBLACK of Indiana, and Mr. SIDNEY CLARKE of Kansas, managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up the Indian appropriation bill with a view to the appointment of a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 387) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the committee of conference on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution of the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 787) exempting pensions from the internal revenue tax—to the Committee on Finance.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 188) for the appointment of a commission upon transportation between the western States and the Atlantic sea-board—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. I move now to take up the Northern Pacific railroad bill and as I yielded for the purpose of acting on the President's veto, I hope the Senate will consent to take it up. I do not propose to go on with it this evening any further.

Mr. JOHNSON. It will come up to-morrow.

Mr. CONNESS. Not unless it is taken up now.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 387) to secure the speedy construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph line, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 16, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions on leave, to be referred to their appropriate committees, and not to be brought back into the House by motions to reconsider.

JOHN GORDON.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill to increase the pay of John Gordon, principal messenger to the Postmaster General; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PREEMPTION AND HOMESTEAD LAWS.

Mr. FERRY introduced a bill amendatory of the preemption and homestead laws; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

MINNESOTA RAILROAD GRANT.

Mr. DONNELLY introduced a bill making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of a branch railroad from the waters of Lake Superior to the British possessions; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CEDING PUBLIC LANDS TO STATES.

Mr. HENDERSON introduced a bill ceding the public lands to the several States in which they lie; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions having been concluded, the next business in order during the morning hour was the conclusion of the call of States and Territories for resolutions, commencing with the Territory of Colorado, where the call rested on Monday last.

No resolutions were introduced under that call.

The next business in order was the consideration of resolutions which have laid over under the rule.

TRANSPORTATION FROM THE WEST.

The first resolution was the following, submitted by Mr. RAYMOND on the 2d of April:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That a commission of five persons be appointed by the President of the United States to consider and report to Congress at its next session upon the necessity of some more speedy, cheap, and reliable means of transportation between the western States and the Atlantic sea-board; and to submit some plan, whether by law or treaty, whereby the national Government can aid in providing for said necessity if it shall be found to exist: Provided, That said commissioners shall receive no compensation for their services, and no payment of any kind except for such traveling expenses as they may actually incur in discharging the duties imposed upon them by this resolution.

Mr. RAYMOND. I presume there will be no opposition to the passage of this resolution. Its object is simply to consider the question of promoting speedy and cheap communication between the western and eastern sections of the country. It involves no expense, nothing but an investigation and expression of opinion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] that as this resolution provides for an appointment to be made by the President, it should be a joint resolution and not a concurrent resolution.

Mr. RAYMOND. I accept the suggestion of the Chair, and will modify it so as to make it a joint resolution.

The joint resolution was then read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. RAYMOND moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

The next resolution was the following, offered by Mr. PRICE on the 9th instant:

Resolved, That on and after Tuesday, the 10th instant, and until otherwise ordered, the House will commence its sessions at eleven o'clock a. m.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the word "tenth" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "seventeenth." I presume the House is well satisfied by this time that there is very urgent necessity for the passage of this resolution, and I therefore call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question was taken upon the resolution as amended; and upon a division there were—ayes 51, noes 39; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. PRICE and J. L. THOMAS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 51.

So the resolution was not agreed to.

RIGHT OF WAY—MILITARY RESERVATIONS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is a joint resolution (H. R. No. 183) concerning the right of way of railroad companies through military reservations, and for other purposes. This resolution was introduced on the 9th of July by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. ANDERSON,] under the call of States, and, giving rise to debate, it went over under the rules. The question is on ordering the resolution to be engrossed and read the third time.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior, the right of way not exceeding one hundred feet in width on each side of the track, with the necessary grounds for depots and stations, shall be granted to all railroad companies for the construction and operation of their roads over and upon all military reserves. The President is authorized to restore from time to time to the public domain any portion of such reserve over or near which the Union Pacific railroad or any of its branches may pass, and which shall not be required for military purposes; the same, when so restored, to be subject to existing laws concerning public lands in the same manner as if the reserve had never been made. It is provided further that the President shall not permit the construction of any railroad upon any such reserve, or diminish such reserve in any manner so as to impair its usefulness for military purposes so long as it shall be required therefore.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Has this joint resolution been before any committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Missouri to state last Monday that the resolution had been considered by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was considered by the Committee on Public Lands, who are unanimous in recommending its passage. The resolution grew out of a petition to Congress to grant the right of way to the eastern division, Union Pacific railroad, through the Fort Riley reservation. General Grant, General Sherman, and other military officers who have examined the matter, are not in favor of granting the right of way to this railroad through that particular reservation, but are willing that there should be granted four or five thousand acres of the lands reserved for military purposes, but the committee thought it would be sufficient to grant one hundred feet on each side of the road. When this resolution was introduced the other day, several gentlemen rose to debate it, and there seemed to be objection to it. But I do not see why there should be objection to the measure. The whole matter is subject to the approval of the President. There are some twenty-two thousand acres of land in the Fort Riley reservation. Under this joint resolution not more than one thousand acres will be taken for railroad purposes, leaving still twenty-one thousand acres for the reservation. The War Department states that the fort will be abandoned in the course of a year, and that nineteen thousand acres will be amply sufficient for all military purposes. The resolution does not grant the right of way except subject to the approval of the President, and not even in that event if the land is necessary for military purposes. I hope gentlemen will not persist in their objections to the measure. I call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, when—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ANDERSON] yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. When the gentleman from Missouri, on last Monday, asked the House to pass this bill, I had to interpose a very resolute objection, and I think that the House will second me to-day in that objection, when the attention of members is called to the first section. I desire particularly the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to this point, for the bill, would appropriately come from that committee, if from any. The first section provides—

That, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, to be made and filed with the Secretary of the Interior, the right of way, not exceeding one hundred feet in width on each side of the track, with the necessary grounds for depots and stations, is hereby granted to all railroad companies for the construction and operation of their roads over and upon all military reserves.

This proposes that every railroad in the United States shall have the right to go over the military reservations of the country—

Mr. ANDERSON. Subject to the approval of the President.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As every bill is subject to the approval of the President; and I hope that he will veto a great many bills of this kind. Now, sir, can we afford to pass such a bill? I think the House will not consent to pass any such measure; and I hope the gentleman from Missouri will withdraw his call for the previous question, and consent to the reference of the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri having yielded the floor to me, I will avail myself of the opportunity to say that I trust no general resolution or act of this kind will be passed. There have been three or four applications for the privilege of constructing railroads through military reservations at this session of Congress, each one of which in succession has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, each one of which has been carefully considered, and the report in each case has been made, allowing the privilege, but restricting it according to the particular circumstances of the case.

Now, for instance, one application was made for the construction of a road along the border of the Columbia river, between a bluff and the river, to which this resolution would not at all apply, where there was not one hundred feet to be given on either side, or scarcely one hundred feet at all; and after the consideration of the whole matter it was found absolutely essential to guard the public interest by putting in a provision not more than was barely sufficient should be occupied for the track, and there should be no houses or constructions of any kind in connection with the railroad which should interfere with any other canal or railroad that may be constructed hereafter between the bluff and the river. The committee, after examination, came to the conclusion there was underneath the application, if not designed, at least the possibility of the railroad having the entire monopoly of the transit along that route to the exclusion of any other public interest in all time to come.

Again, in the case of a horse railway between the city of Leavenworth and Fort Leavenworth, it was found necessary to require that, if operated by steam, the railroad should run beneath the bank to be out of the way, and not to obstruct the military reservation for the proper use of the Government; and they found more than fifty feet could not be granted, while this authorizes a grant not exceeding one hundred feet. My inference from all this is, the United States, as the proprietor of these military reservations, ought to grant, according to the special circumstances of each case, the privilege when applied for, and no general act whatever is necessary. There have been, as I have said, three or four applications, each one of which has differed from the other, and the recommendation of the committee in each case has been made to conform to the circumstances of the case. I think that had better be the way hereafter. Under a general law an opening may be left under the broad discretion granted which may be abused. I hope, therefore, the resolution may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs to consider the necessity and propriety of such a general law. That committee has had under consideration three or four special cases, each of which has been acted on, as I have said, according to the peculiar circumstances attending it. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that this resolution goes further than it would seem from the explanation given by the member who reports this resolution. It is provided in the second clause that the President shall restore from time to time to the public domain any portion of said reserves over or near the Union Pacific railroad, or any of its branches, which shall not be required for military purposes, the same, when so restored, to be subject to the existing laws concerning the public lands in the same manner they would have been if said reserves had never been made. This resolution will not only grant the right of way, but, if those lands are restored to the public domain, it will grant to these companies a large portion of the public lands in addition. These military reservations comprise many thousands of acres of the most valuable lands. The resolution should not pass.

Mr. ANDERSON. There has been more opposition than I expected, and I do not object to the reference of the resolution.

The resolution was then referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the call of the States and Territories for resolutions and bills on leave, in inverse order, commencing with the Territory of Montana.

PUBLIC MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. HIGBY introduced a bill to legalize the occupation of the public mineral lands and to extend the right of preemption thereto; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. HIGBY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed.

No objection was made, and the bill was ordered to be printed.

PAY OF A MEMBER.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Hon. JOHN L. THOMAS, jr., $1,235 34, the same being the amount of salary accruing between the 4th day of March, 1865, and 1st day of August, 1865.

For the information of the House I will say that the gentleman from Maryland was not elected until the August preceding the commencement of this Congress, and he cannot draw his salary, there having been another member elected from his district to the Thirty-Ninth Congress who never qualified. I ask the previous question.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. For what purpose?

Mr. PHELPS. To make an explanation in connection with this subject.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Oh, yes, sir; I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PHELPS. I wish to state that the case covered by the resolution offered by the gentleman from Iowa is precisely the case which has been already acted upon by this House in relation to the claim of Mr. Daniel W. Gooch, a member elected to this House from the seventh district of the State of Massachusetts, who resigned his seat for the same purpose that the predecessor of my colleague [Mr. J. L. THOMAS] resigned his, and he did it about the same time. He resigned his seat for the purpose of accepting the office of naval officer of the port of Boston, and the predecessor of my colleague, Colonel Webster, resigned to accept the collectorship of Baltimore. That has established a precedent in this case, in which the amount of pay from the time the Congress commenced on the 4th of March has been awarded by this House in the case of Mr. Gooch, and should be awarded for the same reasons to Colonel Webster in the case now pending. That is the explanation I wish to make. I trust the House will not put itself in the position of having awarded this pay to a member from Massachusetts and under the same circumstances refuse to a member from Maryland the same emolument.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not wish to encumber this resolution with anything in relation to the pay of Mr. Webster. I understand that there are two other members in the same position.

Mr. PHELPS. I wish to offer a substitute for the resolution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will hear what it is.

Mr. PHELPS. It is precisely the same resolution that was passed in the case of Mr. Gooch, but applying to Colonel Webster, the name only being changed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If it only relates to that of course I cannot yield to have it offered as a substitute. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa a single question.

The SPEAKER. The House is acting under the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have no objection to the gentleman asking me a question, if the House will permit it.

No objection was made.

Mr. PHELPS. I wish to ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, the passage of this resolution would reverse the action of the House in the case to which I have called attention, and preclude Colonel Webster from receiving the same emolument that has been already voted to Mr. Gooch, of Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not suppose that the passage of this resolution would prevent the House from disposing of so much of its contingent fund as would pay Mr. Webster from the 4th of March up to the 4th of August. That is a question for the House to consider.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire now to offer my resolution.

The SPEAKER. The State of Iowa is now being called, and the gentleman does not represent that State.

COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES.

Mr. KASSON submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed, if compatible with the public interests, to communicate to this House any information he has received from the United States commissioner general to the Paris Exposition in relation to international movements for a reform of the system of coinage, weights, and measures.

PAY OF HON. E. H. WEBSTER.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he is hereby, directed to pay Hon. E. H. Webster, who was elected a member of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-Ninth Congress, from the second district of Maryland, the amount of his salary from the 4th of March, 1865, to the day of the date of his resignation as a member of this House.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF CLERKS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, submitted the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That the several clerks of the committees of the House, whose pay has heretofore been four dollars per day, shall be paid at the rate of five dollars per day during this Congress for the time actually employed.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WARD. I rise to a question of order. There has been adopted by this House a resolution directing that all propositions for increase of salary or compensation of the employés of this House shall be referred to the Committee of Accounts without debate.

The SPEAKER. The House has ordered the main question to be now put, no member making that point in time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. With the permission of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] I will say that the salaries of most of these clerks have been increased at this rate. And this is but simple justice to the others, if we are going to deal alike with all, "without regard to race or color," and all that sort of thing.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the resolution; and upon a division there were—ayes 43, noes 29; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WARD, and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 35.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. WARD called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution was accordingly agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXEMPTING PENSIONS FROM TAXATION.

Mr. INGERSOLL introduced a bill exempting pensions from the internal tax; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length. It provides that from and after the passage of this act any person receiving a pension from the United States is hereby authorized to deduct, in addition to the $600 now exempted, the amount of such pensions in making the return of his or her income required under the internal revenue law.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF HON. R. S. HALE.

Mr. KUYKENDALL submitted the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and is hereby, directed to pay to Hon. R. S. HALE, from the sixteenth congressional district of New York, the amount of salary due from March 4 to August 24, 1865.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KUYKENDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF HOUSE CLERKS AND EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of privilege, to the correction of the records of the House. It will be recollected that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] introduced a resolution providing for the increase of pay of the clerks and employés of the House. I moved an amendment providing that the salaries of all officers of the House which had been increased at the present session should not extend beyond the first day of next Congress. That was the nature of my amendment, as the Speaker will very well recollect, because he made the suggestion. But the resolution has been engrossed so as to read "shall not extend beyond the first session of the next Congress." I ask that the correction be made in accordance with the facts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot state whether the gentleman from Illinois said "first day of the next Congress" or "first session of the next Congress." The gentleman did not reduce his amendment to writing; and the Clerk took it down as he supposed was intended.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I said "the first day of the next Congress." I offer the following resolution, to conform to what I believe the House understood:

Resolved, That the salaries of the employés of the House, increased at this session of Congress, shall not extend beyond the first day of the next Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman having already offered one resolution, unanimous consent is necessary to allow him to offer another.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I object.

Mr. COOK. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the salaries of all officers of the House, increased at the present Congress, shall not extend beyond the first day of the next Congress.

Mr. ROLLINS. I suggest to the gentleman to modify his resolution by inserting after the word "officers" the words "and employés."

Mr. COOK. I modify the resolution in that way.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. We have heretofore agreed to grant these employés a certain amount, and no doubt they have drawn it. Why should we now take it back?

Mr. COOK. This simply limits the increase to the present Congress. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

On agreeing to the resolution, there were—ayes fifty-seven, noes not counted.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POLITICAL RIGHTS OF REBELS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to furnish this House with copies of opinions given by members of the so-called cabinet of the confederate States of America to Jefferson Davis, at or about the time of the negotiations preceding the surrender of Johnston to General Sherman, concerning the effect of such surrender upon the political rights of the people then in rebellion against the United States; and also any other papers in the War Department relating to the same subject.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLICATION OF MAIL CONTRACTS, ETC.

Mr. BAKER. By request of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act of June 25, 1864, to expedite and regulate the printing of public documents, and for other purposes, as directs that the annual reports of the Postmaster General of officers received and contracts made for conveying the mails be no longer printed, or of repealing so much of the act to change the organization of the Post Office Department, approved July 2, 1830, as requires such reports to be annually made to Congress.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

PAYMENT FOR SLAVES ENLISTED.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the debts and obligations of the Government should be held sacred, especially such as have been solemnly recognized by law as just, and their payment provided for by appropriating and setting apart a fund for that purpose; and the repudiation of any such debts, whether they be for partial compensation to loyal men for slaves taken and employed in military service by the Government or for other property, should be discontinued and condemned by all loyal men and by every department of the Government.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 23, noes 70.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. KERR. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 32, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Dawes, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Elliot, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Ashbel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Laflin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McKee, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Ward, Warner, Elitha B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—88.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ancona, Baker, Boyer, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Johnson, Kerr, Latham, McCullough, McRuer, Morris, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, and Wright—32.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Chanler, Coffroth, Cook, Culom, Culver, Darling, Davis, DeForest, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Goodyear, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hayes, Hill, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Jones, Kelso, Le Blond, Loan, McIndoe, Mercer, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Pomeroy,

So the resolution was laid on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. TROWBRIDGE stated that Mr. CROFTH and Mr. FARQUHAR were detained from the House by illness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER then announced that the morning hour had expired.

DORANCE ATWATER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, the papers in the case of Dorence Atwater, late a private in the general service United States Army; which, on motion of Mr. HALE, was ordered to be printed and referred to the select committee on the subject.

PUBLIC LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in compliance with a resolution of the House, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in relation to the public lands within certain limits in the State of California; which, on motion of Mr. HIGBY, was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BREVETS IN THE REGULAR ARMY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, a report of all brevet ranks conferred upon officers of the regular Army since April 12, 1861, to the date of the report; which was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I am instructed, Mr. Speaker, by the Committee on Banking and Currency to make a report in the case of the Merchants' National Bank of Washington.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I was going to move that the report and the documents referred to therein be ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I will yield if the motion embraces the printing of the entire testimony.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I cannot agree to that. The testimony is submitted with the report, and is voluminous; and it appears to me if the report and documents referred to therein be printed it will be quite sufficient. There are some six hundred pages of the testimony. I think a great deal of it will be found to be of little interest. The report and the documents referred to are all that can be needed to give the public a complete knowledge of the whole subject.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Then I shall exercise my privilege and call for the reading of the report.

Mr. HALE. I have the floor, and yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts, but if the reading of the report be demanded I hope it will be withdrawn.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I shall insist on having the report read; and I move that all of the evidence taken be printed with the report.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to suspend the rules, so as to dispense with the reading of the report.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the report for the present.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad Senate bill No. 20, granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast.

Mr. WRIGHT. I object.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KASSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 337, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1867. As preliminary to the proposition I have to submit I wish to make a brief statement. This is the regular Indian appropriation bill, intended to provide supplies called for by treaties with the various Indian tribes. It was so reported from the Committee on Appropriations, and it went to the Senate as a bill appropriating about two million one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. It comes back from the Senate appropriating something over four million dollars. Nearly all of the $2,000,000 added in the Senate is for supplies called for by new treaties made with the Indians.

In connection with these new treaties, the Committee on Appropriations have proposed to non-concur in the amendment of the Senate, pro forma in order to obtain proper information from the conferees on the part of the Senate touching the provisions of the treaties under which these grants are made. Some of these treaties introduce a new practice and provide annuities for forty years, while formerly they were limited to twenty years, with here and there an exception as far as thirty years. The Committee on Appropriations have deemed it proper, if possible, to come to some understanding with the Senate as to the extent to which the treaty-making power should be carried in binding us to carry out treaties.

I wish here to submit a statement of the yearly appropriations for Indian expenditures. In the year 1829 the appropriation was $199,102 53; in 1839 it was $603,693 45; in 1861 it was $1,822,930 43; in 1863 it was $1,866,835 88; in 1864 it was $2,131,865 67; in 1865 it was $2,257,932 96; in 1866 it was $3,036,848 91; and now, under this bill, it is about $4,050,000.

With this increase in the appropriations for this one branch of the public service, mainly arising from the unlimited discretion of the Senate in making treaties with Indian tribes, it has seemed to the Committee on Appropriations necessary, in connection with this bill, to come to some understanding that will limit this extravagant increase in the appropriations for this branch of the public service. With this intention the Committee on Appropriations propose that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate involving appropriations to carry out the new treaties, so that the committee may examine the treaties and ascertain whether any guard can be thrown around the expenditure of appropriations for Indian affairs. We have, therefore, recommended a non-concurrence in all the miscellaneous extra treaty appropriations in the bill with a view to a free conference with the Senate on the proper mode of arranging these matters for the future as well as in the present bill. If the House concurs in the propriety of this course, I propose that the action recommended by the Committee on Appropriations be concurred in in gross, and the bill allowed to go to a committee of conference for the purposes which I have named.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the Senate (S. No. 343) to quiet land titles in California.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution and a bill of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 132) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and set-the accounts of Caleb T. Fay and William Y. Patch, late assessor and collector of internal revenue at San Francisco; and

A bill (S. No. 408) making appropriation for the erection of a military hospital at Yokohama, in Japan, and for other purposes.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] states that the amendments of the Senate to this bill increase the appropriations made by the House nearly $2,000,000; and that the Committee on Appropriations recommend that all the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in.

Mr. KASSON. No, sir; not all the amendments of the Senate—only the essential ones. We recommend a concurrence in some immaterial amendments.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that this bill contains an appropriation of $40,000 for the payment of Indian indebtedness in Oregon and in Washington Territory. I wish to say that the amendment of the Senate in regard to that matter is of great importance to the whites, as well as to the Indians upon that coast. Friends around me suggest that I had better let the bill go to a committee of conference, and I submit to their better judgment; but I still wish to urge upon the House the great importance of a fitting appropriation for the payment of Indian claims upon that coast. We are in a condition of perpetual warfare with the Indian tribes there, and have been for years; and we shall probably continue to be so unless these claims arising out of treaties already made, shall be settled.

Mr. KASSON. I wish simply to add that so long as we adopt the plan of paying the Indians for every breach of the peace they commit, and rewarding them for every war they commence, so long will wars be continually renewed upon us by the Indian tribes. I will read from the report of General Pope to Lieutenant General Grant in support of what I have said. General Pope says:

"The treaty of peace which Governor Edmonds proposes to make, and which he thinks the Indians will be very willing to make, is, I presume, such a treaty as it has been the unvarying practice of the Indian department to make heretofore. A supply of food and presents, to induce the Indians to assemble, and to satisfy them during negotiations, is first bought and transported to the place where the Indians are to meet the negotiators.

"A treaty is then made which provides that the United States Government shall pay certain annuities of goods and money so long as the Indians remain at peace. In other words, the Indians are bribed not to molest the whites. Past experience shows very conclusively what the Indians think of such a transaction. No country over yet preserved peace, either with foreign or domestic enemies, by paying them for keeping it. It is a common saying with the Sioux that whenever they are poor and need powder and lead they have only to go down to the overland routes and murder a few white men, and they will have a treaty to supply their wants. If such is the kind of treaty which will be satisfactory to the Government, I do not doubt that Governor Edmonds is right in saying he can make one, either with the Sioux or any other Indians whatever. He has only to notify the Indians, hostile or not, that if they will come to a certain place he will insure their safety, going and coming, and will give them presents and food, and make arrangements for continuing to supply them, provided only, they will sign a paper promising to keep the peace toward the whites. But the very Indians with whom he now proposes to treat have signed such a paper and gone through the same absurd performance once before at least, some of them oftener. Is there any reason to suppose that they are going now to keep their word any better than they did then? Of one thing we may be sure, and that is, that they will now demand a higher price for signing such a promise than they did before, and in six months or less will be ready for another treaty at a still higher price.

"It seems idle to pursue the subject. It seems to me that no man can fail to understand, if he wishes to understand the matter at all, that such a practice as this only encourages Indians to commit hostile acts. Every time they do it they are thus paid for it. The treaties I have directed military commanders to make are simply an explicit understanding with the Indians that so long as they keep the peace the United States will keep it; but as soon as they commit hostilities the military force will attack them, march through their country, establish military posts in it, and as a natural consequence their game will be driven off or killed; that the Indians can avoid this by keeping the peace and in no other manner. This is a peace which involves no expenditure of public money for annuities or presents, and is no doubt objectionable to Indian officials on that account; but as it certainly will not involve any more Indian wars than have hitherto occurred, and will be certain again to occur under the present Indian system, it will have the merit at least of greater economy. Indians will keep the peace when they fear the consequences of breaking it, and not because they are paid (and badly paid, too) for keeping it, and when they can by the present system of treaty-making really make more by committing hostilities than by keeping the peace.

"The Indians with whom Governor Edmonds proposes to treat are Indians who are now violating a former treaty. What have they done to entitle them to presents and annuities, or to greater confidence in their promises; unless, indeed, the violation of former treaties and the murder of whites is to be thus compensated?

"I am very willing to unite with Indian officials or anybody else to secure peace with the Indians; but not willing, if I can prevent it, to pay Indians for outrages committed upon innocent women and children, and thus encourage them to a renewal of the same atrocities. I oppose the proposed treaty of Governor Edmonds, because it will only lead to renewed hostilities, and very certainly, in the future as in the past and the present, involve the necessity of exactly the same operation in treaty-making."

I will not read further from the report of General Pope. I will now submit my motion that the House agree to the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations, to agree to some and to disagree to others of the amendments of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill, and to ask for a committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. And upon that motion I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. KASSON was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX ON CIGARS, ETC.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution to correct an error in the internal revenue bill lately passed by Congress, which has caused some trouble to the Department.

No objection was made, and the joint resolution was introduced and read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length. It provides that such parts of the act entitled "An act to reduce internal taxation and to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay the interest on the public debt, and for other purposes,' approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof," as referred to the tax or duty on cigars, shall be so construed that the ad valorem duty of twenty per cent. shall be levied only on the excess of value above twelve dollars per thousand.

Mr. STEVENS. A word or two of explanation is all I have to say. When the question of the tax on cigars left this House, cigars valued at twelve dollars per thousand and under were subject to a tax of four dollars per thousand; above that value, forty per cent. was added to the excess of value above twelve dollars. We supposed that the committee of conference had left it precisely in that position, except reducing the ad valorem from forty to twenty per cent. I suppose that was really the intention of Congress when the bill was passed. But the Department say that they cannot so construe it; that, as it now reads, it must be so construed as to mean not only four dollars per thousand for cigars valued at twelve dollars per thousand and under, but that the twenty per cent. ad valorem must be added to the cigars up to twelve dollars per thousand, making two dollars and forty cents more or six dollars and forty cents on the cigars which it was intended should be four dollars. It was not so in the original bill; it was not so in the amendment which was lost, and not so, I suppose, in the report of the committee of conference. It is to correct that error that I have introduced this joint resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say one word. It was the intention of the committee of conference, as I understood, to charge upon cigars valued at twelve dollars per thousand and upwards a tax of four dollars per thousand, and twenty per cent. upon the full value of those cigars; but upon cigars valued at less than twelve dollars per thousand four dollars only. If I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] it is to charge upon cigars valued over twelve dollars per thousand a tax of four dollars per thousand, and twenty per cent. ad valorem upon the excess over twelve dollars. Now, it seems to me that such a proposition deserves a little further consideration. If, as the gentleman states, the law is construed to mean that cigars valued at twelve dollars per thousand and under, shall also pay the twenty per cent. ad valorem, in addition to the four dollars per thousand, then I will say that, as I understood, that was not the intention of the committee.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose the committee of conference wanted to make it the same as the original bill, except reducing the ad valorem from forty to twenty per cent. However, if the gentleman wants time to examine this joint resolution, I shall not object.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that I shall object to it; but I do not now understand thoroughly the effect of it.

Mr. STEVENS. In order to give time for examining the joint resolution I have introduced, I will move that its further consideration be postponed until to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The motion was agreed to.

ASSAULT UPON A MEMBER.

Mr. DEMING. I call for the regular order of business.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. SPALDING, from the select committee on breach of privilege, in the matter of Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, of Kentucky, and Hon. JOSIAH B. GRINNELL, of Iowa.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, it is an ungracious task, with the mercury at ninety degrees and upwards, in such a House as this, to attempt to secure the attention of this body or to occupy much of its time.

It is with no little hesitation that I have risen to advocate my view of this question, which differs from that of the entire committee—with the more hesitation from the high standing and character of that committee, which commend it to every member of this House. But entertaining the views which I do, I cannot do otherwise than attempt to the best of my ability to vindicate briefly those views.

I do not propose to differ with the finding of the committee as to the facts. Nor do I differ with the committee in its conclusions as to the power of this House to vindicate its own privileges to the widest and fullest extent. I trust that I shall not be found regardless of the high privileges of this House. I trust I shall not be found to undervalue the importance of the fullest protection to the personal privileges of members of this House. It is, sir, because I esteem those privileges highly, because I would prevent this House from becoming a scene of disorder and violence, because I would protect its members not only from violence but from insult, that I have offered the amendatory resolution, now pending, which I now rise to advocate.

As to the peculiar form of the resolution, or the precise shape in which the conclusions of this House may find expression, I am not strenuous. That to which I object and against which my remarks will be directed is what seems to me an unjust and improper discrimination in the case before this House against one who acted under provocation—against the man who, I believe, has been "sinned against" certainly not less than "sinning."

The chairman of the select committee, in discussing this question on Saturday, anticipated various lines of argument that might be used against the propositions of the committee; questions as to the power of Congress—questions as to its power in different directions. None of those lines of argument which he then anticipated and met do I propose to follow. I admit in its fullest extent the power of this House to punish any and every person for a breach of the privileges of its members. I admit that this power extends as well to the protection of their persons and characters outside the walls of this Hall as inside. I admit that there can scarcely be found a limit to the power which this House may exercise for the full protection of personal freedom from violence and freedom from insult. I put this case simply upon its peculiar facts; and I shall argue that, simply as a question of propriety, as a question of desert, we ought not to adopt the propositions either of the majority or the minority of the committee.

First in order, I propose to consider the character of the assault committed by Mr. ROUSSEAU upon Mr. GRINNELL; and I suppose that in a case involving directly the action of the House upon those persons it is proper I should speak of them by name, instead of designating them in the usual manner, by the States which they represent. If I am right in this I shall continue to speak of these parties by their names.

The assault committed by General ROUSSEAU upon Mr. GRINNELL is admitted by the committee and shown by the whole evidence to have been an assault rather for purposes of insult and disgrace than for the purpose of perpetrating personal injury. The committee report this fact expressly. It does not, as has been charged outside of this House and in the public prints, partake in any degree of the character of brutality in the sense of personal injury intended. I mention this, not as claiming that thereby it is any the less the subject of the protection of this House by animadversion or punishment to be inflicted upon the party offending; but I simply desire to trace in connection the whole case and consider what ought to be done and not what may be done. And right here permit me to refer to a single branch of the report of the committee upon the facts, which I regret to find is not quite so full and explicit as the facts in the case would warrant, and failing in this respect to present the circumstances as they were admitted in the argument of the chairman of the committee on last Saturday. The committee, in their report, refer to the fact that three men were present armed; and they used this language:

"Three persons were present as friends of Mr. ROUSSEAU: the first, on account of information received from Mr. ROUSSEAU that a personal assault was possible, if not probable; the second, on account of a suggestion or call from the first; and the third followed Mr. ROUSSEAU to the portico, on account of his excited appearance and manner when passing through the Rotunda. It does not appear that any one of these parties was informed of his intended action except the first. These friends of Mr. ROUSSEAU were all armed with loaded revolver or pistol."

The chairman, in the discussion of the case on Saturday, conceded that the report ought to be modified so as to say three persons were present who were friends of Mr. ROUSSEAU—not that they were present as friends, which would seem to imply they were present on his invitation, and in the capacity of friends at a fray. I asked the chairman while reading the evidence in regard to their presence, whether it did not appear before the committee that General ROUSSEAU had no knowledge they were armed, and he answered that it only appeared by the declaration of General ROUSSEAU himself to that effect. I then asked the gentleman to read five lines on top of page 21, which I hoped he would do, and call attention to the fact that there was other evidence in the same direction. There Mr. Pennybaker, when upon the stand being questioned by Mr. ROUSSEAU, answered as follows:

"Question. Was it so understood that you were not to interfere between Mr. GRINNELL and myself?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. Did I have any knowledge of your having arms?"

"Answer. No, sir; nobody had."

There is the testimony of an additional witness negating the idea of knowledge on the part of General ROUSSEAU of such armed presence; and there is no evidence whatever to the contrary.

So far, then, as the assault is concerned, the report of the committee leaves it simply here: a member of this House, without arms upon his own person, without any calling in of armed friends, for the purpose of inflicting insult and disgrace on another member of the House assaulted him at the door of the Capitol and inflicted personal chastisement on him. That case, standing simply thus, without other circumstances of extenuation, of excuse, or apology, certainly stands strongly enough and should most imperatively call upon this House to vindicate its own character and protect the privilege of the assailed member.

Nor do I propose, Mr. Speaker, to justify this action of Mr. ROUSSEAU. I do not feel called upon to discuss the question of the legal or moral justification. We are all familiar with the legal rule that there can be no legal justification of violence by provocation of any words, however insulting or abusive. Perhaps in a moral sense the same rule holds, that there can be no moral justification of an assault or personal violence by words of insult. But we all know, and there is not a man in this House, I venture to say, who would not so act if circumstances called for it—we all know there is a great class of cases where perhaps no legal or moral justification in a technical sense exists, where the person technically guilty of a wrong may be so far excused, his provocation may so far extenuate the act itself, that no body of men, no jury even, would be found to visit upon him the extreme penalty of the law, even of the moral law. Although not justified, he may be excused and his conduct extenuated.

Am I wrong in making this proposition? Suppose I meet a member of this House in the street and deliberately and wantonly there insult him, calling him, if you please, a liar or thief or coward, and he knocks me down on the spot for my words. Nobody can doubt Congress has the right to interfere, that the power of Congress to interfere and protect the person of its member may be lawfully exercised; that the assailant may be brought in here and dealt with for breach of privilege. But I ask gentlemen to say, if that state of facts should occur, whether anybody would believe it would be a proper case for the interposition of Congress? Where one by his own deliberate misconduct brought, perhaps wrongfully so far as the assailant is concerned, but certainly wrongfully so far as the insulter is concerned, where he has brought this personal violence upon himself, will it be claimed that Congress ought to interfere? I certainly think not. I need not refer to a large class of similar cases where the whole tone of public sentiment enunciates that where a party has by provocation on his own part drawn violence upon himself, he should not be the one to invoke the aid of the law or the extreme penalty which a parliamentary body may impose for his own protection.

Now, what was the provocation which led to this assault? Upon the 11th day of June last, according to your record, Mr. GRINNELL, rising in his place in this House to a personal explanation, by leave of the House, used certain language, which I now ask the Clerk to read.

"JUNE 11, 1866.

"Mr. WINDOW resumed the floor.

"Mr. GRINNELL. I ask the gentleman to yield a few moments for a personal explanation.

"Mr. WINDOW. Certainly.

"Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest reluctance that I rise to say anything which might seem personal. I have been a member of this House for three sessions, and in all that time I have had no personal contest, and no unkind feeling toward any person in the House. I claim to be a man of peace. I claim first to be a gentleman. But, sir, when any man, I care not whether he stands six feet high, whether he wears buff and carries the air of a certain bird that has a more than usual extremity of tail, wanting in the other extremity, says that he would not believe what I utter, I will say that I was never born to stand under an imputation of that sort.

"The gentleman begins courting sympathy by sustaining the President of the United States preparatory to his assault upon me. Now, sir, if he is a defender of the President of the United States, all I have to say is, God save the President from such an incoherent, brainless defender, equal in valor in civil and in military life. His military record! Who has read it? In what volume of history is it found?"

"Some time ago the gentleman asked some of us, 'What did you do in the rebellion but make speeches?' And he told us that he was in the field and got some little reputation with half-way secession Kentucky. But where was he in any great fight? Ask General Grant, or any of the leading officers. Where was he in the great fights? Ask General Grant if you want his private opinion about him. Go to the general officers; and since he has alluded to Iowa, I will give the opinion of a leading officer from that State, for not two weeks ago he told me that when there was a noise in camp the men said it was either a rabbit or General ROUSSEAU. He the defender of the soldiers of Iowa! Sir, they want no such defender; they want none of his defense. He has not led them in the battle, and it is all pretense; it is the merest mockery; it is the merest trickery, the merest blowing of his own horn, for him to say that he led our soldiers. Where was the deadly hail when they were under his command? But he comes here to traduce a humble person like myself. In the first place, he charged me with saying what I never did say. When he went down to make a speech to the Fenians in New York he is reported to have said this: 'As I said on the floor of Congress on one occasion, as a thing was made at my native State by a pitiable politician from Iowa. [Hisses.] You will excuse me for giving his name, but I believe it was one GRINNELL.'

"It was 'one GRINNELL' that he alluded to. But I never made any fling at Kentucky. That is my name. I am so called and so known where I live. But that is not all. He was not content with using my name, but he refers to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] in these terms: 'I say that man is a miscreant, and I cannot find words to express my disgust and contempt for him.' To whom does that relate? To a member of this House! And here he stands up, six feet and over, calling himself a buttoned-up general officer."

"Now, sir, I wish to deny any unfriendliness toward the gentleman or toward the State of Kentucky. I deny that I ever made any remark which could be construed to mean anything unfriendly in that respect. So far from that being the case, I have held Kentucky in high regard. I have held in high regard the gentleman who preceded in Congress the gentleman from Kentucky who has spoken to-day. His predecessor writes to me that he will be returned here by five or ten thousand majority.

"Now, sir, why should I speak of this matter? Certainly not because I believe that my people would doubt my word. Sir, allusion has been made to the soldiers of the different States. I am proud to say that I represent a district that sent thirteen thousand men into the Army. Can the gentleman say as much? I did speak something about the men from Kentucky fighting on both sides. Sir, I have been sent here by a majority of seven thousand; and I do not go to the State of Kentucky for indorsement, nor do the soldiers of Iowa. Their record is made, and it was not made under the leadership of any man from Kentucky. It was made under the leadership of their own colonels and generals, and under General Grant and General Sherman. When the gentleman gets up here and claims the honor of having led the Iowa soldiers, I say that they were not so led; that they spurn such an intimation; and in this I mean nothing personal."

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Private Secretary, returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, the bill of the House (H. R. No. 613) entitled "An act to continue in force and to amend an act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes," with his objections thereto in writing.

ASSAULT UPON A MEMBER—AGAIN.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I have sent those extracts to the Clerk's desk to be read for the purpose of including in my remarks here the whole history of this transaction from the beginning to the end; and also for the purpose of placing before this House the remarks of Mr. GRINNELL upon the occasion in question, as originally taken down by the reporters at the desk, the remarks to which we all listened here, and which remarks, as afterward published in the Congressional Globe, differed so widely from the spoken remarks as to deprive them of many of their most stinging and wanton insults. What does this language amount to? Passing by the trivialities, if they may be so called, of the ridicule cast upon Mr. ROUSSEAU as to his person, his dress, his manner, his intellect, his resemblance to a peacock, and all that style of certainly most insulting and unparliamentary comment; passing by all this as unworthy to occupy any time here, in view of what remains of this case, I say that this language, in the first place, charges General ROUSSEAU with cowardice; it charges him over and over again, in all the forms of stinging innuendo, with that most contemptible and lowest of all vices in a military man—cowardice! It charges upon him that he has no military record; that he has been in no great fight; that he never led the soldiers of Iowa in battle; that he is held in no estimation by General Grant, and other leading officers of the Army; that they regard him with contempt; that he was compared by one leading officer to a rabbit, an animal certainly not remarkable for its valor; and that with this inefficient, worthless, and cowardly military career he has stood up in this House and falsely, and as a vain-glorious braggart blown his own horn, and pretended to an honorable military record; that he has falsely claimed the honor of having led Iowa troops in battle, and that the soldiers of Iowa shun him and his pretenses, and would scorn to go to Kentucky for indorsement. That is the length and breadth of the charges made upon General ROUSSEAU by Mr. GRINNELL in this paragraph.

Now, sir, the fact that these charges are made upon a member of this House is enough, certainly, to call for an inquiry as to the violation of the privileges of the House by the member using that language. In this case there are circumstances connected with the career of General ROUSSEAU which, I think, I may properly allude to, and which I ought to allude to in this connection, to show how much more stinging, how more flagrantly wanton, and unjust was this attack made upon him than it might have been had it been made upon most of us who sit upon this floor. There are circumstances in General ROUSSEAU's career which, I think, fairly entitle him, in the consideration of all right-minded men, to at least the ordinary treatment of a gentleman in this House. Who of us has forgotten, or who can forget, his first political record upon the breaking out of the great rebellion; how he stood in the Senate of Kentucky, not hesitating, not halting, not planting himself upon a platform of half neutrality, but, almost alone, against an immense majority, standing up from the beginning to the end nobly, strongly, truly, to maintain the Union of this nation—to stand by his country and his Government? Who of us can forget how he fought that battle until the time came to take up arms, and how, then, within the first few months—ay, within the first few weeks of the rebellion, he resigned his seat in the Senate to enter the field, and was commissioned first as colonel, and then as brigadier general? Who can forget the services that he rendered at Shiloh, at Corinth, at Perryville, at Stone River, at Chickamauga? He has left his military record in the reports of his commanding officers. He never was in battle where he failed to elicit their warmest commendations for his gallantry, his skill, and his superior ability as an officer. His commission as a major general recites upon its face that it was conferred for highly meritorious service in the field.

I allude, sir, to these things not as bearing upon the question of his right to commit an assault or his justification in committing it, but I think I have a right to allude to them that I may ask the House to consider how much more stinging these insults, thus wantonly uttered upon this floor, must have been to such a man. Now, sir, how can such a man be supposed to comport himself after such an attack under such circumstances? I protest that whatever act of anger he may have committed, that almost any extreme even of personal violence resorted to under such provocation would be a thing that every man of us on this floor might well hesitate to bring in question and try. I submit that there is no man upon this floor but ought, before condemning anything that a man does under such a provocation as that, to examine himself and say whether, with such a provocation, he might not be led to do much greater wrong and violence.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] if he means the House and the country to understand that if a member here feels himself aggrieved in debate by a fellow-member; and feels also that the House does not furnish him with that protection to which he is entitled, thereupon and elsewhere, and in such manner and by the use of such weapons as he may choose, he is to exact what he may consider a compensation for the wrong done him?

Mr. HALE. It is very evident that what I have said so far has been said to very little purpose, or has not been listened to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] or he would not have asked me the question he has. In the very beginning of my remarks to-day I disclaimed entirely any question of justification. I have argued the whole case upon the ground that it was merely a question for the discretion of this House, and nothing else. I have said nothing which would warrant the gentleman from Massachusetts in the conclusion to which his question would seem to indicate he had come in regard to my line of argument. If he will do me the honor to listen to me, I am sure that before I get through he will see that I claim nothing of the kind which he would seem to indicate that I claim. Now, sir, right here I will allude incidentally to a single matter which is covered by the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] and that is the lapse of time that occurred between the assault made upon this floor, and the assault made upon the steps of the Capitol. It has been alluded to repeatedly, out of this House if not in it, as taking this case out of the ordinary rule of action, under the heat of passion or aggravating circumstances, but with the facts in the case as they appear from the report of the committee, it seems to me such is not the case.

It appears that an intimation was made, probably from an unauthorized source, to Mr. ROUSSEAU that an apology would be made in the House by Mr. GRINNELL for this language; that in expectation of that apology he waited from day to day for four days, in order to give ample time for what he felt was due to him from his antagonist. In doing that it seems to me that we ought not to say that he aggravated any possible offense that he might have committed, and that he took away the palliation of passion and anger. For I submit to any man, whether resting under such insults from day to day for four days, with the expectation and what he believed to be the assurance that an apology was to be made, it is not to be presumed that his anger will necessarily continue to be inflamed the more from day to day, instead of cooling from day to day, by the persistent omission to apologize? Waiting for a deserved apology which fails to come, is not giving time for passion to cool, but for passion to become more and more inflamed. Now, sir, it is assumed, and the gentleman from Massachusetts in his question to me assumes it, that the language used by Mr. GRINNELL toward Mr. ROUSSEAU was language used in debate upon this floor. In a certain sense it doubtless was debate; within the rules permitting this House to regulate the conduct of its members, and to protect them from what may be uttered here, it was undoubtedly, in one sense, debate.

But in the fair, legitimate, proper use of the word "debate" I submit that the remarks of Mr. GRINNELL which have been read at the Clerk's desk were not used in debate. He was not discussing any question before this House; he was not discussing any measure of legislation or any subject that might properly occupy the time of the House. He asked the leave of the House to make a "personal explanation," an explanation of something involving himself, with the purpose, as I understand it, of setting himself right before the public. Availing himself of that occasion, not only outside the range of "debate" proper of the legislative action of this House, but outside the range, as I understand, of any right conferred by the favor of the House for a matter of "personal explanation," he utters this most insulting language.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman from New York will allow me, I desire to remind him that the language of the Constitution is that "for any speech or debate in either House they (that is, Senators and Representatives) shall not be questioned in any other place."

Mr. HALE. I will relieve the gentleman entirely from the necessity of making any point of that kind. I conceded at the outset of my remarks that it was within the constitutional power of this House to punish, and that so far as technicality goes, the language used furnishes no justification whatever for the assault.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman seemed to be commenting upon the word "debate." I simply wished to remind him that the language of the Constitution is more comprehensive, the words being, "for any speech or debate."

Mr. HALE. I comment on the word "debate," not as contending that this House has not the same power to protect its members from accountability elsewhere for anything said on this floor, but solely on the general proposition that no suppression of the proper "freedom of debate" has been here attempted.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say right here, if the gentleman from New York will allow me, that, as I understand the facts, my colleague [Mr. GRINNELL] rose to a personal explanation because the gentleman from Kentucky, in the course of his remarks, made a charge upon my colleague, and refused to allow him at the time to make an explanation.

Mr. HALE. I hardly think, Mr. Speaker, that I ought to be interrupted for the purpose of such a statement as that. I have not assumed to discuss any provocation between these parties prior to the occasion of which I have been speaking. I believe that no possible provocation could induce a man having a proper regard for himself or a proper sense of the proprieties of this House to rise here and deliver such remarks as were uttered by Mr. GRINNELL on that occasion. I do not propose to go back to consider whether there had been prior provocation. I will content myself with saying that, in tracing back the history of this matter to the beginning, it will be found that the first personal attack came from Mr. GRINNELL upon General ROUSSEAU, and not from ROUSSEAU upon GRINNELL; and the columns of the Congressional Globe will bear me out in this statement.

Now, sir, as I said, I do comment on the word "debate," not, as I have repeated more than once, for the purpose of implying in any degree any limitation upon the power of this House to protect its members, but that gentlemen shall not put this case upon the ground that "freedom of debate," in its proper, ordinary, well-understood sense, is in any manner brought in question in this case. Is it "freedom of debate" for a member to rise in this House, no question whatever being before the body, and deliberately and wantonly insult another member? If so, sir, I confess I have misapprehended the ordinary meaning of the word "debate." I do not think that is the sense in which it is used by those who use language correctly. Nor do I think that the term "freedom of debate" has any particular application to such a case. If "freedom" means simply "license," without limitation of rule, or law, or anything else, then this man did exercise freedom in the words he uttered. But in any proper sense of the term "freedom of debate" he can no more be covered by it than any man who, without any ground whatever, simply rises here and attacks another member by abusive language in defiance of all rules.

The Speaker of this House, in his ruling upon this very case, recognized, and I doubt not very properly, the distinction which I here make. When the language to which I have called attention was uttered by Mr. GRINNELL I for one sat, here astonished beyond measure that a member of this House was permitted to proceed in the use of such language. I did not deem it my place to call him to order, for, inexperienced as I was in the usages of parliamentary assemblies, I supposed, in my innocence, that it was the duty of the Speaker to restrain such language. The Speaker himself, in afterward stating the line of action which he pursued and the reasons for it, stated that the precedents were the other way; that, by the practice of the House, the Speaker not being invited to yield his consent to a personal explanation, and being the only member of the House who is not so invited, the rest of the House having granted the leave, it is, according to usage, for the rest of the House to regulate the debate, not for the Speaker to interfere in the first instance. If I had understood that rule—which is undoubtedly the correct one as stated by the Speaker—if I had so understood it, I most certainly would take to myself still greater shame and self-abasement that I had set here in my seat and been privy to permitting such a proceeding to go on here. Today, sir, I say frankly, I look back with self-abasement and self-reproach to the part I took in this transaction in being a silent spectator of such a proceeding.

Now, sir, the point to which I come is this: that in the report made by the committee they have been guilty of what seems to me—and I beg pardon for using the word guilty, perhaps I ought not to use it—they have committed an error which strikes me as a most palpable one, especially when taken in connection with the remarks of the chairman of that committee on Saturday. This committee report that the assault made by General ROUSSEAU on Mr. GRINNELL was intended for the purpose of disgrace and insult, and not for the purpose of serious personal injury. They report that it was provoked by the unparliamentary, improper, and untrue language of Mr. GRINNELL. They report that the charge of cowardice and improper conduct as an officer which he made upon General ROUSSEAU was unfounded; that General ROUSSEAU's military record is unblemished. Then most singularly they fall out of the line of the argument they pursue, and in reference to which the chairman in his remarks claps the climax by saying, and I think most justly and properly, that if he had made such remarks upon this floor as were made by Mr. GRINNELL, he should have thought he ought to be expelled from the body. Taking that line of facts reported by the committee and that admission made by the chairman in his argument on Saturday, it seems to me a most extraordinary spectacle that the majority of this committee have reported as the punishment of one of those insults the expulsion of the misdoing member from the House, and as to the other insult which provoked the former, an insult I submit in the eyes of every right-minded man quite as flagrant, a charge of cowardice against an officer, a charge of falsehood and false pretense upon this floor against a member, as damning an insult as a blow; for the first of these insults equal in extent, prior in time, the provoker of the other, they say—what? Not expulsion, not a reprimand at the bar of the House by the Speaker, not a censure, but the mild expression that such things "merit the disapproval of this House." It is most delicately put. To call a gallant officer, an honorable member of this House, falsely, a coward, a liar, a braggart, upon this floor, to do it deliberately under color of vindicating his own personal reputation from aspersion, is conduct in the language of this resolution which "merits the disapproval of this House."

Sir, I cannot believe that the immense distinction which was here taken between the insult offered by GRINNELL to ROUSSEAU and the insult offered by ROUSSEAU to GRINNELL duly received the attention and consideration of that committee. I cannot believe they intended to say here, we will for one gross and wanton insult, not only to a member of this House, but to the privileges of the House, indicate our disapproval, our sense that it merits the disapproval of the House, and will visit the other with the extremest punishment this House can inflict.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] asked me a little while ago if I proposed to assert here that any person who considered himself insulted upon the floor of this House was at liberty to go out of the House and vindicate himself by an act of violence upon the offending party. I disclaimed in the beginning any such argument. I disclaim it now. I simply say, and I say by my resolution, when such an assault, such an insult is committed upon the floor of this House and the member insulted fails to receive the protection of this House, and follows it with action not monstrously disproportioned to the aggravation received, I will not say he is justified, but I will not discuss the question of justification.

I contend that when this House has permitted one of its members thus to make an attack upon the character of another member, and has failed to protect the member assailed, I, for one, say that when he, in following up that insult, and avenging it as he may see fit, does not do it in such a way as to be grossly and monstrously disproportioned to the offense committed, it is a matter which the House should not inquire into. In this case, the fault originated with the party finally injured. He ought to have been dealt with by the House for his violation of its privileges. Whether General ROUSSEAU was justified in his subsequent conduct I leave it to his own conscience to decide. But, sir, in my judgment, whether the House shall adopt the amendment which I have offered or not, whether they shall deem that action ought to be taken here such as will properly vindicate the rights of members or not, one thing is certain, and that is, that their action should not look to the punishment of Mr. ROUSSEAU only. This House ought not to put itself in the position of condemning severely the party who acted under great provocation and let off the party who gave that provocation with the mildest possible expression of disapproval.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to ask the gentleman a question; and it is simply this—whether he does not know now that the first provocation on the day of which he speaks came from the gentleman from Kentucky; whether that gentleman did not say that there was not a member upon the floor who believed a word my colleague said? Does not the gentleman know that that was the first provocation on that day?

Mr. HALE. I do not know any such thing.

Mr. PRICE. The record shows it.

Mr. HALE. If it be true it is immaterial.

Mr. PRICE. It is not immaterial.

Mr. HALE. The record shows that the first personalities on that occasion were used by Mr. GRINNELL, who made a personal attack upon Mr. ROUSSEAU. I do not think it is necessary to go further back than this, and I can only say, that if the member from Iowa, or other member upon this floor, thinks that a declaration that his colleague is not to be believed in an assertion which he has made, in regard to the military career of General ROUSSEAU, is to be answered by charges of cowardice and false pretenses and braggart lying he certainly has a very peculiar taste, very peculiar ideas, and very remarkable notions regarding the proper reply to an insult.

Mr. RAYMOND obtained the floor.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU—VETO MESSAGE.

Mr. ELIOT. With the permission of the gentleman from New York I desire to have the President's veto message laid before the House, and then I propose to move that it be laid upon the table and printed, giving notice that I will call it up to-morrow after the morning hour for action.

Mr. RAYMOND. I must decline to yield for the purpose of having the message read, though I have no objection to having it presented and laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. It is always considered respectful to the President that messages of this character should be read. Does the gentleman from New York yield for that purpose?

Mr. RAYMOND. If it is a matter of respect to a higher authority I will yield.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

A careful examination of the bill passed by the two Houses of Congress entitled "An act to continue in force and to amend an act to establish a Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes," has convinced me that the legislation which it proposes would not be consistent with the welfare of the country, and that it falls clearly within the reasons assigned in my message of the 19th of February last, returning, without my signature, a similar measure which originated in the Senate. It is not my purpose to repeat the objections which I then urged. They are yet fresh in your recollection, and can be readily examined as a part of the records of one branch of the national Legislature. Adhering to the principles set forth in that message, I now reaffirm them, and the line of policy therein indicated.

The only ground upon which this kind of legislation can be justified is that of the war-making power. The act of which this bill was intended as amendatory was passed during the existence of the war. By its own provisions it is to terminate within one year from the cessation of hostilities and the declaration of peace. It is therefore yet in existence, and it is likely that it will continue in force as long as the freedmen may require the benefit of its provisions. It will certainly remain in operation as a law until some months subsequent to the meeting of the next session of Congress, when, if experience shall make evident the necessity of additional legislation, the two Houses will have ample time to mature and pass the requisite measures. In the mean time the questions arise, why should this war measure be continued beyond the period designated in the original act; and why, in time of peace, should military tribunals be created to continue until each "State shall be fully restored in its constitutional relations to the Government, and shall be duly represented in the Congress of the United States?" It was manifest, with respect to the act approved March 3, 1865, that prudence and wisdom alike required that jurisdiction over all cases concerning the free enjoyment of the immunities and rights of citizenship, as well as the protection of person and property, should be conferred upon some tribunal in every State or district where the ordinary course of judicial proceeding was interrupted by the rebellion, and until the same should be fully restored. At that time, therefore, an urgent necessity existed for the passage of some such law. Now, however, the war has substantially ceased; the ordinary course of judicial proceedings is no longer interrupted; the courts, both State and Federal, are in full, complete, and successful operation, and through them every person, regardless of race and color, is entitled to and can be heard. The protection granted to the white citizen is already conferred by law upon the freedmen; strong and stringent guards, by way of penalties and punishments, are thrown around his person and property, and it is believed that ample protection will be afforded him by due process of law, without resort to the dangerous expedient of "military tribunals," now that the war has been brought to a close.

The necessity no longer existing for such tribunals, which had their origin in the war, grave objections to their continuance must present themselves to the minds of all reflecting and dispassionate men. Independently of the danger in representative republics of conferring upon the military in time of peace extraordinary powers—so carefully guarded against by the patriots and statesmen of the earlier days of the Republic, so frequently the ruin of Governments founded upon the same free principle, and subversive of the rights and liberties of the citizen, the question of practical economy earnestly commends itself to the consideration of the law-making power. With an immense debt, already burdening the incomes of the industrial and laboring classes, a due regard for their interests, so inseparably connected with the welfare of the country, should prompt us to rigid economy and retrenchment, and influence us to abstain from all legislation that would unnecessarily increase the public indebtedness. Tested by this rule of sound political wisdom, I can see no reason for the establishment of the "military jurisdiction" conferred upon the officials of the bureau by the fourteenth section of the bill.

By the laws of the United States, and of the different States, competent courts, Federal and State, have been established and are now in full practical operation. By means of these civil tribunals, ample redress is afforded for all private wrongs, whether to the person or the property of the citizen, without denial or unnecessary delay. They are open to all, without regard to color or race. I feel well assured that it will be better to trust the rights, privileges, and immunities of the citizen to tribunals thus established, and presided over by competent and impartial judges, bound by fixed rules of law and evidence, and where the right of trial by jury is guaranteed and secured, than to the caprice and judgment of an officer of the bureau, who, it is possible, may be entirely ignorant of the principles that underlie the just administration of the law. There is danger, too, that conflict of jurisdiction will frequently arise between the civil courts and these military tribunals, each having concurrent jurisdiction over the person and the cause of action—the one judicature administered and controlled by civil law, the other by the military. How is the conflict to be settled, and who is to determine between the two tribunals when it arises? In my opinion it is wise to guard against such conflict by leaving to the courts and juries the protection of all civil rights and the redress of all civil grievances.

The fact cannot be denied that since the actual cessation of hostilities many acts of violence, such perhaps as had never been witnessed in their previous history, have occurred in the States involved in the recent rebellion. I believe, however, that public sentiment will sustain me in the assertion that such deeds of wrong are not confined to any particular State or section, but are manifested over the entire country, demonstrating that the cause that produced them does not depend upon any particular locality, but is the result of the agitation and derangement incident to a long and bloody civil war. While the prevalence of such disorders must be greatly deplored, their occasional and temporary occurrence would seem to furnish no necessity for the extension of the bureau beyond the period fixed in the original act. Besides the objections which I have thus briefly stated, I may urge upon your consideration the additional reason that recent developments in regard to the practical operations of the bureau in many of the States show that in numerous instances it is used by its agents as a means of promoting their individual advantage; and that the freedmen are employed for the advancement of the personal ends of the officers, instead of their own improvement and welfare, thus confirming the fears originally entertained by many that the continuation of such a bureau for any unnecessary length of time would inevitably result in fraud, corruption, and oppression.

It is proper to state that in cases of this character investigations have been promptly ordered, and the offender punished whenever his guilt has been satisfactorily established. As another reason against the necessity of the legislation contemplated by this measure, reference may be had to the "civil rights bill," now a law of the land, and which will be faithfully executed as long as it shall remain unreppealed and may not be declared unconstitutional by courts of competent jurisdiction. By that act it is enacted "that all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States; and such citizens, of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right in every State and Territory in the United States, to make and enforce contracts, to sue, to be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding."

By the provisions of the act full protection is afforded, through the district courts of the United States, to all persons injured, and whose privileges, as there declared, are in any way impaired; and heavy penalties are denounced against the person who willfully violates the law. I need not state that that law did not receive my approval; yet its remedies are far preferable to those proposed in the present bill; the one being civil and the other military.

By the sixth section of the bill herewith returned, certain proceedings by which the lands in the "parishes of St. Helena and St. Luke, South Carolina," were sold and bid in, and afterward disposed of by the tax commissioners, are ratified and confirmed. By the seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh sections, provisions by law are made for the disposal of the lands thus acquired to a particular class of citizens. While the quieting of titles is deemed very important and desirable the discrimination made in the bill seems objectionable, as does also the attempt to confer upon the commissioners judicial powers, by which citizens of the United States are to be deprived of their property in a mode contrary to that provision of the Constitution which declares that no person "shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." As a general principle such legislation is unsafe, unwise, partial, and unconstitutional. It may deprive persons of their property who are equally deserving objects of the nation's bounty as those whom by this legislation Congress seeks to benefit. The title to the land thus to be portioned out to a favored class of citizens, must depend upon the regularity of the tax sale under the law as it existed at the time of the sale, and no subsequent legislation can give validity to the rights thus acquired as against the original claimants. The attention of Congress is therefore invited to a more mature consideration of the measures proposed in these sections of the bill.

In conclusion, I again urge upon Congress the danger of class legislation, so well calculated to keep the public mind in a state of uncertain expectation, disquiet, and restlessness, and to encourage interested hopes and fears that the national Government will continue to furnish to classes of citizens in the several States means for support and maintenance, regardless of whether they pursue a life of indolence or of labor, and regardless also of the constitutional limitations of the national authority in times of peace and tranquility.

The bill is herewith returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, for its final action. ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 16, 1866.

Mr. ELIOT. I move that the message be laid on the table and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT. I give notice now that immediately after the morning hour to-morrow I shall call this bill up and ask immediate action upon it, without debate.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move that two thousand extra copies of the message be printed.

Mr. LE BLOND. I hope the number will be made twenty thousand copies. I think this is a good document. I would suggest to the author of this bill whether he had not better take action upon it immediately. It may be too long to wait until to-morrow morning to pass it over the veto, and without debate. The sooner action is taken the more apparent will be the bad animus.

Mr. ELIOT. I have no objection. [Cries of "There is none."] I move, then, to reconsider the vote by which the matter was postponed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall this bill become a law, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. ELIOT. Upon that I call the previous question.

The question was taken upon seconding the call for the previous question; and upon a division, there were—ayes 68, noes 30.

So the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a question of order. Can this subject be taken up in preference to all other business without a two-third vote?

The SPEAKER. It can, for, this is a constitutional question.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not see why we need be in such a hurry.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. One of your own side [Mr. LE BLOND] suggested that the vote better be taken now.

Mr. ROGERS. Well, he was not in earnest, of course. [Laughter.]

Mr. LE BLOND. I hope the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] will make no objection.

Mr. WARD. I submit that the Democrats should choose their leader, and not confuse us in this way. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question must be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 33, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Dawes, DeFrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Ketcham, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and the Speaker—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Boyer, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Kuykendall, Le Blond, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Neill, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rouseau, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Henry D. Washburn, and Wright—33.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Chanler, Coffroth, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Davis, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Goodyear, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hayes, Hill, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Jones, Kelso, McCullough, McIndoe, Paine, Patterson, Pomeroy, Radford, John H. Rice, Schenck, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stitwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, Upson, and Winfield—45.

During the call of the roll, the following announcements and statements were made:

Mr. MOULTON. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. CULLOM, is absent on account of indisposition. If he was present he would vote for the bill.

Mr. DAWES. My colleague, Mr. BALDWIN, is detained in his room by indisposition. If he was present he would vote for the passage of this bill.

Mr. ELIOT. I desire to state that the gentleman from New York, Mr. POMEROY, is paired with his colleague, Mr. HUMPHREY, on this question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The understanding with Mr. POMEROY was that when I left the city we were to be paired. I told him I would not leave until the latter part of this week.

Mr. ELIOT. I only stated what I understood from Mr. POMEROY.

Mr. ORTH. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. FARQUHAR, is detained from the House by indisposition. If he was present he would vote for this bill.

Mr. COBB. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. PAINE, is absent from the Hall today on account of indisposition. My colleague, Mr. SLOAN, is absent and paired on this question with Mr. HARRIS. Both of my colleagues, if present, would vote for this bill. Mr. HARRIS, I think, would vote against it if he were here. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. My colleague, Mr. SCHENCK, was compelled to leave the House about an hour ago by indisposition. He would vote for the bill if he were present.

Mr. DRIGGS. My colleagues, Mr. BEAMAN and Mr. UPSON, are absent on account of illness. If they were here they would both vote for this bill.

Mr. EGGLESTON. My colleague, Mr. HAYES, is absent on account of indisposition. I am authorized to state that if he was present he would vote for this bill.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. My colleague, Mr. F. THOMAS, is absent on account of indisposition. If he were present I am satisfied he would vote for this bill.

Mr. WARD. I desire to say that most of my colleagues are opposed to this veto.

Mr. JOHNSON. My colleague, Mr. DENISON, is absent on account of serious illness. If he were present he would undoubtedly vote against the passage of this bill. And I desire to say further that there are a great many more members voting "ay" now, than there will be in the next Congress upon similar measures.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to say that Mr. INGERSOLL stated to me that he was obliged to leave the House on account of indisposition. If he were present he would vote for the passage of this bill.

Mr. PERHAM. My colleague, Mr. RICE, has been compelled to leave the city. If he was present he would vote "ay."

Mr. HOTCHKISS. My colleague, Mr. HUBBARD, is absent on account of indisposition. If he was present he would vote for the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received a note from Mr. DODGE stating that he is detained from the House by indisposition.

Mr. ANCONA. I desire to state that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCULLOUGH] has been called away from the House within the last few minutes. If he were here he would vote in the negative.

The call of the roll being concluded,

The SPEAKER. On the reconsideration of this bill, entitled "An act to continue in force and to amend an act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes," the vote is 104 in the affirmative and 33 in the negative. Two thirds having voted in the affirmative, the bill has, notwithstanding the objections of the President, again passed. [Applause.]

ASSAULT UPON A MEMBER—AGAIN.

Mr. RAYMOND. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there was a time in the history of this Government when a breach of the privileges of the House of Representatives by an assault upon one of its members for words spoken in debate would have been considered a very grave offense. But, sir, judging from the remarks which have been made upon the case we are now considering, one would be justified in concluding that that time has passed. Around the members of this body the Constitution has thrown its special protection; but that does not seem to be regarded as of any consequence now. One might conclude from the run of the debate upon this occasion that my colleague is upon trial rather than the member from Kentucky.

Now, sir, I wish to examine for a few minutes the character of the offense of which the gentleman from Kentucky is guilty. The Constitution of the United States, in the fourth section of the first article, provides as follows:

"The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. They shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to or returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place."

That is the language of the Constitution of the United States. The gentleman from Kentucky, when he at the beginning of the session presented himself as a member of this body, was required by the law and the Constitution to take at the Clerk's desk, in the presence of the House and the country, an oath to support that Constitution. His oath covered as much the section I have read as any other section of the Constitution. He therefore is guilty of a higher offense than would be involved in an act of like character committed by a person not a member of this body. If a person not a member of this House should commit an assault upon a member for words spoken in debate, although guilty of a great offense, he would not have resting upon his conscience a violation of that obligation which requires every member of this body to observe the Constitution of the United States. Therefore I say that the offense which the gentleman from Kentucky has committed is the gravest which can be committed against the privileges of this House and its members. That, sir, is the character of his offense, a violation of the Constitution which his solemn oath requires him to observe, respect, and maintain.

This being the character of the offense, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] who last addressed the House on this case, might well have said that he would not claim that the gentleman from Kentucky was justified, by any circumstances attending this case, in making the assault; that he would not discuss the question of justification; that he would put that altogether aside. And I was amazed that a gentleman of his intelligence should, while thus insisting upon the absence of justification, make a speech which, in spirit, was, throughout its length and breadth, a justification of the assault committed on the person of my colleague. And why? Because my colleague, in a debate upon this floor—or, if the gentleman from New York says that it was not in "debate," I will say in a speech upon this floor—used language which was distasteful to the member from Kentucky—language of such grossly insulting character, as insisted by the gentleman from New York, that the member from Kentucky could not resist that natural impulse which required at his hands a castigation of the member uttering such language.

Now, I propose to see whether there is not another side to this case. I propose to see whether the gentleman from Kentucky, whose conduct is sought to be palliated, if not justified, has so governed his utterances in this House as to keep himself entirely from the charge of having furnished provocation to the gentleman from Iowa to retort in the manner he did.

The difficulty between the gentleman from Kentucky and my colleague had its origin in the month of February. During that month the gentleman from Kentucky made a speech on the Freedmen's Bureau bill. In that speech he made use of language to which my colleague excepted; and in some remarks which he made on the 5th of February I find the following:

"Mr. GRINNELL. History repeats itself. I care not whether the gentleman was four years in the war on the Union side or four years on the otherside; but I say that he degraded his State and uttered a sentiment I thought unworthy of an American officer when he said that he would do such an act on the complaint of a negro against him."

The allegation by the gentleman from Kentucky was that he would shoot a negro who would cause his arrest by an officer of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I never used such language as that on any occasion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman will not have any question with me when he hears me through. I said that was the charge alleged by my colleague as to what the gentleman from Kentucky said in his speech. It was made before the publication of the speech in the Globe, the gentleman from Kentucky having withheld his speech for revision. The gentleman from Kentucky, on the 6th day of February, having read in the Globe the speech of the gentleman from Iowa, rose to a personal explanation, and I read from the Globe the following:

"Mr. ROUSSEAU. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to make a personal explanation. Before doing so I will ask the Clerk to read a paragraph which I have marked in the report of yesterday's debate, as published in the Daily Globe of this morning."

"The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. GRINNELL. History repeats itself. I care not whether the gentleman was four years in the war on the Union side or four years on the other side; but I say that he degraded his State and uttered a sentiment I thought unworthy of an American officer when he said that he would do such an act on the complaint of a negro against him."

"Mr. ROUSSEAU. Mr. Speaker, I did not use the language imputed to me by the member from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL.] And I pronounce the assertion that has just been read, that I have degraded my State and uttered a sentiment unworthy of an American officer, to be false, a vile slander, and unworthy to be uttered by any gentleman upon this floor."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the language of the gentleman from Kentucky made use of on that occasion was of course entirely pure, chaste, and parliamentary. He only denounced the utterance as false and a vile slander unworthy to be uttered by any gentleman on this floor. This is all entirely competent and parliamentary, having been made by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I ask the gentleman, was that not a proper reply to an assertion that I had degraded my State and uttered sentiments unworthy of an American officer?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am not here to pass any special judgment on the action of the gentleman from Kentucky as to what in his opinion may or may not be proper language for him to use. I am now, sir, endeavoring to show that there is at least some shadow cast across the bright, brilliant, and unexceptionable parliamentary pathway which has been claimed for that gentleman.

On that same occasion my colleague sought the floor for an explanation and used this language:

"Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no explanation further than to say that the gentleman has withheld his remarks, and that I have published mine. I alluded to his remarks as I understood them, and stated distinctly that I had no desire to do the gentleman any injustice. I criticised his language as I understood it, and I stand by that criticism. If I did not represent his language correctly, then I make an apology to him in regard to that. But if I understood his language correctly I make no apology for my criticism of it. The gentleman from Kentucky responded. My object was not to obtain an apology from the gentleman, but to say what I have said."

And this is the way in which this gentleman who says he waited four days for an apology met the intimation from my colleague that if he had misrepresented him he was ready to make an apology. He did not want an apology. He was not prepared to receive an apology. He had uttered his unparliamentary language for its own sake. Even after the colloquy my colleague offers if he was mistaken to make an apology, but the gentleman from Kentucky wanted no apology—he merely wanted "to say what he had said."

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that there was so much confusion in the Hall on that occasion that I merely heard the word apology. I did not know whether it was the refusal or an offer to make one.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do think that if the gentleman was particularly anxious for an apology, and heard my colleague use the word apology, without knowing whether he was tendering one or refusing one, he might, without any great breach of decorum, have made some inquiry into that subject.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I did not want to do so.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Well, then, the gentleman presents a bar to his own explanation, when he says that he did not want an apology on that occasion.

Thus the case between these two gentlemen rested until the 8th of February, 1866, when my colleague rose to a personal explanation, the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky having appeared in the Globe in the mean time. He said upon that occasion:

"Mr. Speaker, the member from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSSEAU] who used unparliamentary language in reference to myself, is, I observe, in his seat, and I embrace the first opportunity since the publication of his speech to show him what my animus toward him was in the remark I made, and that I had no desire to do him injustice or to impugn his honor. Here is his own language in the Globe. It presents the question of fact, and I read it:

If you intend to arrest white people on the ex parte statement of negroes, and hold them to suit your convenience for trial, and fine and imprison them, then I say that I oppose you; and if you should so arrest and punish me, I would kill you when you set me at liberty."

Now, the discrepancy between what was originally charged by my colleague and what was really said by the gentleman from Kentucky, was that my colleague understood him to say that he would shoot the negro who might cause his arrest, or so charged. But it appeared when the speech came out that he really stated that he would kill the United States officer who would arrest and punish him on the ex parte statement of a negro; that he would wreak his vengeance upon a sworn officer of the Government, and not upon a negro.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I wish the gentleman to do me the justice to read what I said upon the subject, referring to the arrest of a man's wife and child, and the holding of them over to await the convenience of the agent of the Freedmen's Bureau to try them. My remark was in reference to that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I remember very well that the gentleman used that as an illustration in his speech.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I was speaking about that and nothing else. I was referring to the arrest of women and children, not allowing them to remain at home, but keeping them in jail for trial the next day, either for conviction or acquittal. It was about that I was speaking.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman can make his own speech, if he desires to do so, when I am through. I have been stating the case as it is made up between these two gentlemen in the Globe. I have been presenting the language used by them during the progress of this difficulty. It is not for me to account for the motives of the gentleman from Kentucky; his language is what I have to deal with.

Now, sir, there was a correction made here by my colleague, presenting the gentleman's own language as it appeared in the Globe after it had passed under the revision of its author. But the gentleman from Kentucky, not being satisfied with what had occurred, brought the subject up again on the platform in New York, and made some remarks to which my colleague took exception in his remarks of the 11th June. Some two months had elapsed between the last occasion on which the subject was referred to in the House and the reference to it by the gentleman from Kentucky in New York, before an audience in a community where my colleague formerly lived. He denounced him as "a pitiful politician," all of which was, of course, entirely appropriate, and I suppose if it had been said by him upon the floor of this House would have been claimed to have been entirely parliamentary.

We come now to the 11th day of June, when the offense was offered by my colleague which is claimed to be a justification of the assault upon him, or at least in mitigation of it. This was some four months after the original offense and after the gentleman from Kentucky had stated in the House that he did not want an apology from my colleague.

Let me refer to the strictly parliamentary language used by the gentleman from Kentucky in the elaborate speech which he made upon that occasion. He said:

"I had under my command and fighting under me from that member's State, some of the bravest troops from any State in the Union. I was in the war from the beginning of it until the end. In the Northwest I was known to have been in the Federal Army; but that member said he did not know whether I was on the rebel or the Federal side. I do not suppose a member in this House believed one word of what he said."

At this point my colleague rose and endeavored to make an explanation; but the gentleman from Kentucky said:

"No, sir; I cannot be interrupted now. I wish to say that when a member can so far depart from what everybody believes he ought to know, and does know is the truth, it is a degradation, not to his State, for he cannot degrade her, but to himself. Iowa is not to be degraded by any one or even by all of her members on this floor. She is a gallant State, and I know what her people are."

Well, this may be regarded as a kind of general fling at the Iowa delegation. But I let that pass inasmuch as, with the exception of my colleague, [Mr. GRINNELL,] we have no particular interest in the matter beyond the protection of the privileges of members of this House. But I did not read all of his language. I will go further back in his speech, and read another extract from it:

"I said, sir, awhile ago, that flings had been constantly made at my native State, in my hearing, upon this floor; and last and least of all things and everybody, let us give a moment's attention to the member from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL,] who first assailed her here. Shortly after Congress assembled he assailed my State and myself; he charged that I had degraded my native State saying that I would defend my family against the agent of the Freedmen's Bureau. That member was pleased to say on the floor, in answer to a suggestion of my colleague, [Mr. SMITH,] that he did not know whether I had fought four years on the rebel side or on the Federal side in the late war."

Now, I affirm there is just as much of insult in what the member from Kentucky said on that occasion in reference to my colleague as there was in what my colleague said in reference to the gentleman from Kentucky. And let me remind the House here that the whole attack of the member from Kentucky on that occasion was based upon a misrepresentation of what my colleague had said; a misrepresentation of the language which the gentleman from Kentucky himself had studied and made the basis of a personal explanation in this House. Let it be borne in mind that he here asserts and makes it the ground of his attack that my colleague had said that he did not know whether the gentleman from Kentucky had fought on the rebel side or on the Federal side, and remember in this connection that on the 6th day of February, 1866, the gentleman from Kentucky made a personal explanation, to which I have already referred, in which he quoted the language of my colleague, and which he at that time saw and knew to be as follows:

"I care not whether the gentleman was four years in the war on the Union side or four years on the other side."

Not "I do not know," but "I care not." The gentleman from Kentucky gets up in this House to a personal explanation, having read that language in the Globe, having conned it over, having had it read from the Clerk's desk as the basis of his personal explanation. And then, after nursing his wrath for more than four months, he misrepresents the language in order to make an attack on my colleague.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly. Mr. ROUSSEAU. My colleague [Mr. SMITH] told me, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] agreed with him, that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] said he did not know and did not care whether I had served four years on the one side or the other. The gentleman from Massachusetts

[Mr. BANKS] so informed the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] before the committee. Therefore I did not misrepresent, and did not intend to misrepresent, what was said on that occasion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman does not help his case one particle by his statement. He says now that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] told him that my colleague said he did not know and did not care whether he [Mr. ROUSSEAU] served in the rebel army or in the Union Army. That is not what the gentleman from Kentucky said in June. He then said that the language of my colleague was that he "did not know."

Mr. BANKS. My statement before the committee was that my impression and my recollection of the language of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] was that he "did not know."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It would be a sorry thing for this House to establish as a precedent that it will take the recollection or the impression, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] says, as to what language members use in debate, casting aside the report of their remarks in the Globe entirely. The gentleman from Kentucky, in February, made use of the Globe as the basis of his personal explanation. The language therein contained was what he found fault with on that occasion; and yet he changes the language when he comes to speak in June, and refuses to give my colleague an opportunity to explain, declines to yield the floor for an explanation.

Sir, we have had too much "impression" about this case already; altogether too much "impression." Instead of being guided by the imprint which the official type have made upon the official records of this House, the impressions of gentlemen have been resorted to. This is the case so far as the words used in debate are concerned. But I am not ready to yield the case to the gentleman from Kentucky yet. There is one other thing worthy of our attention. After my colleague had responded to the gentleman from Kentucky the gentleman from Kentucky sought the floor again to reply. He did reply to what was said on that occasion by my colleague, and he closed his reply in this language:

"I hope now that I have heard the last of the member from Iowa. I hope I shall never have occasion to recur to the subject again. Whatever glory he has gained in this contest I am content he should wear."

Such, sir, was the parting language of the gentleman from Kentucky to my colleague. He in effect declared that he desired to hear nothing more in relation to the case; that he desired to have nothing more to do with my colleague. With that declaration imprinted upon the records, the member from Kentucky deliberates for four days—"expecting an apology," though he had once notified my colleague that he would not receive one; and closing in the House with the remarks I have just quoted, again notifying my colleague that he wanted nothing to do with him. The belligerents retired from the field. All was at peace, so far as that controversy was concerned. "I won't receive an apology; I do not want an apology. The storm is over. I am satisfied with what I have made, and if the gentleman from Iowa is satisfied with the laurels he has won, let him wear them; I am content." Four days pass; and what then do we find? The gentleman from Kentucky seeks my colleague on the eastern portico of this Capitol and there administers to him a caning—for what? Why, sir, as the record shows, for language used in debate in this House, for which the Constitution which the member from Kentucky swore to support and maintain, declares no member shall be questioned elsewhere. Now, it may be that there is nothing but sunshine on that side of the case; but I want to know from members, whether they are to be driven or coaxed away from their duty of maintaining sacredly the privileges of this body by any sympathy that persons may seek to create here in behalf of the gentleman from Kentucky, who seems to be so abundantly able to take care of himself, and who refuses apologies when tendered. Why, sir, from the nature of the discussion we have had it seems that in this country no man's character is worth anything unless he has been a military man. You may charge a man with being a "liar," a "mere thing," a "pitiable politician;" you may use all kinds of opprobrious epithets toward him; but that is nothing, if he be a civilian; he is nobody. But when a gentleman like the gentleman from Kentucky comes in here from the military service—and whether he performed his duty well or ill, I am not going to question—when such a gentleman comes in here and uses unparliamentary language like that I have read from his remarks, attacking the character of other members of the House, he is to be shielded by that immunity which his service in the Army throws about him. Sir, I trust it will be very long before this House will adopt that doctrine.

Why, sir, the character and reputation of a civilian are as dear to him as the character and reputation of a military man are to him; and when one is attacked it is certainly quite as much a provocation for a return of the attack in the body where the attack is made as language uttered by another is provocation for the military gentleman to change his base outside of this Hall and make his attack there.

Now, sir, I have occupied the attention of the House longer than I had intended when I sought the floor; but I desired to present, at least in an imperfect manner, the side of the case to which very little attention had been given during this discussion. I wish, also, before I conclude, to remind the House of the circumstances attending this assault. The gentleman from Kentucky had been thinking over it for four days. It was a deliberate, malicious assault upon a member of the House for words spoken on the floor. It was not only deliberate on the part of the gentleman himself, but his purpose was conveyed to at least one other person whom he invited to be present, and who by some cunningly devised means managed, without a formal invitation, to have one other there, both of them being armed. The second one testifies that he did not arm himself for the purpose of taking a part in this difficulty; that he did not know that the difficulty would occur. But by some means this man Pennybaker, who was notified of the assault, procured the attendance of these other innocent men who did not know anything about it. It was strange, but it is true.

Now, of course, these parties were all innocent, and this congregating together of three or four persons to assault a member of Congress amounts to nothing. I suppose, from the course this case has taken, that the privileges of this body amount to nothing, that the independence of the representative character, the independence of the legislative body of this nation amount to nothing if you only have its privileges infringed upon by some gentleman who comes here surrounded by military glory such as is claimed for the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. NIBLACK. I want to call the gentleman's attention to a question of construction which I think is of some importance, about which I confess my own mind is not fully settled, which has been suggested to me and which I think had better be presented for notice in this discussion. In defining the privileges of members of Congress the Constitution declares that "for any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place." It has been suggested to me, and I claim no credit for originality in the matter, that it does not extend to a case of the sort we are now considering; that an assault upon a member of the House outside of the House for what he may say in the House does not fall within the meaning of these words of the Constitution; that these words relate to legal proceedings elsewhere, to an action for libel, to an action for slander; that such an action could not be taken elsewhere for words spoken in debate. It has been suggested to me that a collision growing out of words spoken in debate, outside of the House, does not amount to such a questioning in another place, and therefore does not reach to the extent of a breach of privilege.

I concede, Mr. Speaker, that when a high crime is committed you may expel a member; that you may expel a member for this or for any other misconduct; but the point I make is that this does not amount to a breach of privilege, but is an assault and battery to be punished by the courts as in other assaults and batteries.

Mr. SPALDING. I have an authority here which I should like to read.

Mr. STEVENS. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to mean that for words spoken in debate a man outside of the House shall not ask him a question but turn to and flog him? [Laughter.]

Mr. NIBLACK. My point is this: whether flogging is a question within the meaning of the Constitution. I call the gentleman's attention to the point. I think it is at least worthy of the consideration of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suppose the gentleman is serious because he says he is; but that question has been decided time and again. There is no doubt about it. It would be a most remarkable thing to say that you cannot sue a man for slander for what he may say here, but when you get him out of the House you may flog him, you may beat him, you may kill him. There is no ground in this clause for any such construction. The House may have all its members beaten for what they may say in debate until you cannot secure a quorum. Members may all be confined to their beds under the gentleman's doctrine, by assaults made upon them, and the House of Representatives has no power whatever to interfere. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania has well said, under this construction you have only to thrash a member without asking a question and you are safe, but if you ask a question and then thrash him you place yourself within the jurisdiction of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. Suppose the provision of the Constitution referred to declaring that members shall not be questioned elsewhere for language spoken in the House had not been adopted, would then a member be free to be questioned by assault and battery in any other place?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That question is not involved in this case. When it arises I am prepared to answer. I am not disposed to discuss issues which cannot properly be brought into this case.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the member were protected by the law at that time, why then was this inserted into the Constitution for his protection?

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman says certain things could by no possibility come into this question. I would like to know under the ruling of the Chair, what in God's name could not come in. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will admit the question propounded to me is one most difficult to answer under the ruling in this case, and inasmuch as the resolution for the censure of my colleague has been reported by the committee, and the Speaker has decided the point against me, I will take but a moment in again referring to it. My colleague is arraigned before this House by a resolution reported from a committee that gave him no notice whatever that it intended to proceed against him in any manner for any purpose. They subpoenaed him as a witness, and not until the report was in this House had he any idea of such a proceeding as this.

And here I wish to remark that it may be well for the Speaker to reflect upon before this question is raised again in some other case. It was said by the Chair, in ruling upon the point of order which I made, that the whole subject was referred to this committee. Now, suppose I grant that; suppose the whole subject was referred to the committee; what could the committee do? Why, they could examine into and report on the case. How? In accordance with law, in accordance with the rules of the House. Has a committee, because a subject is referred to it, power to overturn the law, and to overturn the rules of the House?

When this committee was conducting its examination, it found that my colleague had used certain language in debate to which the gentleman from Kentucky took exception, and thereupon they said the language was improper and a resolution should be reported to censure the member from Iowa for using it. I deny their right to do this. They might have recommended the adoption of a new rule for future application if the present rules were not thought to be sufficient. But the rule under which they were acting, just as the courts act under a statute, said that unless certain things had taken place on the occasion of the use of that language, the person using it should not be censured or be subject to the censure of the House. And yet, with that rule before them for a guide—just as much a guide to the committee as a statute is a guide to a court—the committee recommend to this House the passage of a resolution which is a palpable and direct violation of one of its rules.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks his question, the Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that it is rather late to review and criticize the ruling of the Speaker. The time for that was when he made his decision, as his decisions are all subject to the reversal of the House. But the Chair will ask the gentleman to permit him to have read that part of the sixty-first rule relating to the subject, so that it may go into his speech.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Oh, certainly.

The SPEAKER. That portion of the rule is as follows:

"And no member shall be held to answer, or be subject to the censure of the House, for words spoken in debate, if any other member has spoken, or other business has intervened, after the words spoken, and before exception to them shall have been taken."

Now, exceptions were taken two or three times to the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa; and that is all that is required as a preliminary to a vote of censure.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I beg leave to state to the Chair, that I did not intend this as a criticism upon the ruling of the Chair; and the Chair will remark that the point which I am now making was not specifically made on that occasion, because I did not discover the necessity of the point until after the decision had been made. I supposed that the other reasons assigned were sufficient. I am not presenting this for the purpose now of rediscussing the propriety of the decision of the Chair. I am presenting it, not as a question of order, but as involving the privileges of my colleague as a member of this House; and I am asking the House to protect him in the enjoyment of his privileges, the report of the committee to the contrary notwithstanding. I think this question is so important that a little discussion of it can do no harm.

As to the first part of the rule, it will be observed that the mischievous semicolon which figured here the other day does not occur in any part of the sentence relative to the excepting to and taking down of words. That part of the sentence is divided merely by commas. It reads as follows:

"If a member be called to order for words spoken in debate, the person calling him to order shall repeat the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's table."

Now, this constitutes a complete division of the sentence, that if a member be called to order for words spoken in debate, the person calling him to order shall repeat the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's desk. For what purpose? Well, the reason for that rule was stated the other day in the ruling of the Chair. It was to prevent members of this House being called to account for words used, after other business had transpired, and when the memories of persons hearing them might not present the language exactly as it was used. It was to get rid of "impressions." Injustice might otherwise arise, for if members could be questioned the next day, they might be questioned the next week; if they could be questioned the next week they could be questioned the next month, and if they could be questioned the next month they could be questioned at the next session of the same Congress. To prevent that and to avoid its attendant danger this rule was adopted. And under it the exception is not perfect unless the words are repeated and taken down at the Clerk's desk.

Now, I ask the House to consider, before they vote to adopt the second resolution reported by the committee, whether it is not an infringement of the privileges belonging to my colleague as a member of this House, and which must be protected in his person, in order that they may be secured for the enjoyment of every other member of this body. Sir, I now submit this case, so far as I am concerned, to this House; and in conclusion I ask members not to lightly regard the solemnity and gravity of the question involved.

Mr. RAYMOND resumed the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. With the permission of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] I would like to inquire of the chairman of the select committee [Mr. SPALDING] when I can be allowed to have an opportunity to offer an amendment. I cannot do so now, for I understand that there are two amendments now pending.

Mr. SPALDING. I propose to call the previous question as soon as the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] concludes his remarks.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] will simply call the previous question upon the amendments.

Mr. SPALDING. That is what I intend to do. I propose to call the previous question on the amendment to the amendment, but after that to allow all the opportunity for debate the House may desire.

Mr. RAYMOND. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] would prefer it I will yield the floor now for the previous question on the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. HALE,] and make my remarks afterwards.

Mr. STEVENS. That would suit me.

Mr. SPALDING. Then I call the previous question on the amendment to the amendment. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, which was upon the amendment of Mr. HALE to the amendment of Mr. RAYMOND.

The amendment of Mr. HALE was as follows:

Resolved, That this House, while expressing its unqualified condemnation and reprobation of the practice of personal reflection and remarks upon the floor of the House, reflecting upon the character of members in the House, and acts of violence toward members upon any provocation of words, however severe and unmerited; and while expressly asserting its power and authority to protect the privileges of its members, both as respects person and character, yet, under all the circumstances of the case, deem it inexpedient to take any further action in the matter of privilege now pending, so far as affecting Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU and Hon. JOSIAH B. GRINNELL.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 27, noes 66.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. GRIDER called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered. So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. RAYMOND to the report of the committee, to substitute for the first resolution reported by the committee the following:

Resolved, That Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU be summoned to the bar of the House, and be there publicly reprimanded by the Speaker for the violation of the rights and privileges of the House, of which he was guilty in the personal assault committed by him upon Hon. J. B. GRINNELL for words spoken in debate.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to move to amend by striking out the first two reported by the committee and insert in lieu thereof the resolution reported by the minority of the committee.

The SPEAKER. But one resolution is now before the House for amendment, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] has notified the House that he shall ask a separate vote on the resolutions reported by the committee.

Mr. RAYMOND. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] can do as my colleague [Mr. HALE] did—move a substitute for my amendment to the resolution now pending, giving notice that if his substitute is adopted he will move to lay the second resolution on the table when it comes up.

The SPEAKER. That is the question now before the House. The second resolution, when it comes up, can be agreed to or laid on the table.

Mr. STEVENS. My desire is to get some amendment which will embrace the first two resolutions reported by the select committee.

Mr. ALLISON. You can move to amend the first, and then move to lay the second resolution on the table.

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; I want to purge the record of the second resolution by a direct vote. The chairman of the select committee [Mr. SPALDING] must perceive that there might be a very different vote, if we are compelled to vote separately upon these resolutions, from what there would be if I could be allowed to offer an amendment to embrace the first two resolutions. If my amendment should be voted down, then a separate vote can be called upon the resolutions. That would be more satisfactory to many gentlemen than to be obliged to vote first upon the resolutions separately. I presume all that is wanted is a satisfactory conclusion of this whole matter.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to have a distinct vote taken on the first resolution. But if it will subserve the purpose of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for me to withdraw temporarily the call for a separate vote, I will do so, in order to accommodate him.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move to strike out the first two resolutions and insert the resolution reported by the minority of the committee. I trust I shall have an opportunity, before the vote is taken, to explain briefly my reasons for making this motion.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] to yield to me a moment that I may offer an amendment to his amendment.

Mr. RAYMOND. I will hear it.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I propose to offer the following as a substitute for the resolution reported by the minority of the committee:

Resolved, That in view of all the circumstances connected with this case, and although the provocation to Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU was great, still this House does not excuse, but disapproves the assault made by him on Hon. Mr. GRINNELL.

Mr. RAYMOND. I prefer not to yield for that amendment. I desire that a vote shall be taken on the distinct proposition made by my motion. I propose that the remarks which I have to make shall be confined to that motion, (which is to substitute the resolution reported by the minority for the first resolution reported by the majority,) and also the motion now made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I desire, however, to state that, as several gentlemen desire to introduce other business, and as the hour is somewhat late, I will, if it meets the convenience of the House, yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER,] that he may move to postpone this subject.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. As the usual hour of adjournment is now reached, I move that this subject be postponed until tomorrow after the morning hour.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 43, noes 55.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 222) entitled "An act further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes;" when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. COBB, from the same committee, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 145) entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas railroad and telegraph;" when the Speaker signed the same.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. RAYMOND. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] who desires to move an adjournment.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House adjourn.

On agreeing to the motion there were—ayes 54, noes 49.

Mr. WENTWORTH called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOOPER of Massachusetts, and WENTWORTH, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 42.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. FINCK: The petition of C. A. Olds, and others, citizens of Pickaway county, Ohio, praying for the passage of a law of Congress for the regulation of inter-State insurances of all kinds.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: A petition from citizens of Greene county, Pennsylvania, for an increase of duties on foreign wool and protection to American interests generally.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The memorial of A. Gieson, and five others, of New York, officers lately of United States volunteers, who were promoted from the ranks after the 3d of March, 1865, praying that the law may be so amended as to extend to them the benefit of the three months' extra pay.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 17, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of yesterday's Journal was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON. I desire very much to get up this morning House bill No. 3, to revive the grade of General in the United States Army. It has been postponed day after day for a long time.

Mr. GRIMES. We have already passed it in the Army organization bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope we shall be allowed to get through with the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive petitions.

Mr. MORRILL presented two petitions of citizens of Maine praying that aid may be granted to the European and North American railway; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CRESWELL. I move that the papers in the matter of the claim of George C. M. Roberts be withdrawn from the files of the last Congress and be referred, together with certain other papers which I now present, to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 236) to authorize the construction of certain bridges, and to establish them as post roads, recommended a concurrence in the House amendments, with an amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 416) extending time to the Alabama and Florida Railroad Company for the payment of duties on railroad iron, asked to be discharged from its further consideration.

He also, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 134) extending time to the Alabama and Florida Railroad Company for the payment of duties on railroad iron; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin for the relief of Alexander F. Pratt, reported a bill (S. No. 435) for the relief of Alexander F. Pratt, accompanied by a report. The bill was read a first time and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 437) in relation to the district courts of the United States in the State of Florida; which was read a first time and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Mrs. Mary E. Bouigny, reported a bill (S. No. 438) for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouigny; which was read a first time and passed to a second reading.

INTERNAL TAXATION.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, submitted by Mr. VAN WINKLE on the 14th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered and agreed to, namely:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate five thousand copies of the internal tax laws now in force, so that the several provisions in relation to the same subject shall be inserted in connection, together with a suitable index, the whole to be compiled and prepared for printing under the direction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

GRADE OF GENERAL.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up House bill No. 8.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 8) to revive the grade of General in the United States Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole. Its first section revives the grade of "General of the Army of the United States," and authorizes the President, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a General of the Army of the United States, to be selected from among those officers in the military service of the United States most distinguished for courage, skill, and ability, who being commissioned as General may be authorized, under the direction and during the pleasure of the President, to command the armies of the United States.

The second section provides that the pay proper of the General shall be $400 per month, and his allowances in all other respects shall be the same as were allowed to the Lieutenant General by the second section of the act approved February 29, 1864, entitled "An act reviving the grade of Lieutenant General in the United States Army;" and that the General may select for his chief of staff a brigadier general from among the officers of the Army holding that rank, and may appoint upon his staff such number of aids, not exceeding six, as he may judge proper, who shall each have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry.

The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia proposed to amend the bill by striking out all of the second section after the enacting clause and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

That the pay proper of the General shall be $400 per month, and his allowance for fuel and quarters, when his headquarters are in Washington, shall be at the rate of $300 per month, and his other allowances in all respects the same as are allowed to the Lieutenant General by the second section of the act approved February 29, 1864, entitled "An act reviving the grade of Lieutenant General in the United States Army," and the chief of staff to the Lieutenant General shall be transferred and be the chief of staff to the General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general in the Army of the United States; and the act approved March 3, 1865, entitled "An act to provide for a chief of staff to the Lieutenant General commanding the armies of the United States," is hereby repealed; and the said General may appoint upon his staff such number of aids, not exceeding six, as he may judge proper, who shall each have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry. And it is hereby provided, that in lieu of the staff now allowed by law to the Lieutenant General, he shall be entitled to two aids and one military secretary, each to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel of cavalry.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, the war through which the country has just passed developed many great military men whose names are associated with this or that particular campaign, or this or that particular field of battle. But viewing the war from its commencement to its close, what man is there whose name, like that of Grant, is connected with almost every really effective military movement which marked its progress? What a record is his. How marvelous are the ways of Providence in the affairs of nations and of individuals. What changes, surpassing the enchantments of romance, may be seen in four short years. Is it not a matter of profound wonder that a man of such stolid simplicity of character and of such surpassing modesty; that the plain, unassuming, quiet citizen of Illinois, who five years ago sought the humblest service in the armies of the Union, should prove to be the only man whose rare genius and energy rose in proportion to the colossal demands of the war; who should rise from the humblest clerkship and step by step ascend every grade of promotion to the exalted rank of Lieutenant General? Is it not strange that such should be the man who has conducted the most gigantic of all wars to a successful conclusion, and whose name, glory-crowned with shining victories, shall fill thousands of history's brightest pages and live in freedom's anthems to the end of time?

It would be affectation in me not to acknowledge a personal as well as State pride in aiding the bill before the Senate with my voice and my vote. As a Senator from the State where General Grant resides, which claims not only an interest in common with other States, but also a special and particular interest in the fame of her illustrious son, I feel it my duty to advocate this measure. Some remarks from me also may not be inappropriate on account of certain personal and official relations in which I stood to him at the commencement of the war.

In April, 1861, I first saw General Grant. I knew nothing of him. I did not then know that he had seen service in Mexico; that he had fought at Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, and at Monterey under General Taylor; or that he had served under General Scott in his memorable campaign from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico; or that he had been made first lieutenant on the field for gallantry at Molino del Rey and brevetted a captain for the gallant and skillful manner in which he had served a mountain howitzer upon the heights of Chapultepec under the observation of his regimental, brigade, and division commanders, as appears from the official reports of the battle by General Worth and other officers. In presenting himself to me he made no reference to any merits, but simply said he had been the recipient of a military education at West Point, and now that the country was assailed he thought it his duty to offer his services, and that he would esteem it a privilege to be assigned to any position where he could be useful. I cannot now claim to myself the credit of having discerned in him the promise of great achievements or the qualities "which minister to the making of great names" more than in many others who proposed to enter the military service. His appearance at first sight is not striking. He had no grand airs, no imposing appearance, and I confess it could not be said that his was a form

"Where every god did seem to set his seal
To give the world assurance of a man."

He was plain, very plain; but still, sir, something, perhaps his plain, straightforward modesty and earnestness, induced me to assign him a desk in the executive office. In a short time I found him to be an invaluable assistant in my office and in that of the adjutant general. He was soon after assigned to the command of the six camps of organization and instruction which I had established in the State.

Early in June, 1861, I telegraphed him at Covington, Kentucky, (where he had gone on a brief visit to his father,) tendering him the colonelcy of the twenty-first regiment of Illinois infantry, which he promptly accepted, and on the 15th of June he assumed the command. The regiment had become much demoralized from lack of discipline and contentions in regard to promotions. On this account Colonel Grant, being under marching orders, declined railroad transportation, and for the sake of discipline marched them on foot toward the scene of operations in Missouri, and in a short time he had his regiment under perfect control.

He was assigned to the protection of the Quincy and Palmyra and the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroads, and his success in organizing the troops under his command, and his vigorous and successful prosecution of the campaign in north Missouri, soon procured for him the rank of brigadier general. He was transferred to Cairo, the most important strategic point in the Mississippi valley, and, after organizing his army with marvelous celerity and infusing into these suddenly raised troops the proper esprit de corps, he marched upon Paducah and fought the desperate battle of Belmont. And here commenced that series of splendid victories, from Belmont to Lookout Mountain, which turned the tide of our national fortunes, dispelled the gloom and despondency which defeat, poor strategy, irresolution, inaction, and blunders had brought upon the country, lifted the veil and revealed to the Republic at last the man so much needed to lead her armies to complete and final victory.

At Belmont, at Donelson, and at Shiloh, he broke the shell in which secession sought to shelter itself and dissipated the dream of fancied southern invincibility. At Vicksburg he probed its very vitals and destroyed the monster in the Mississippi valley, never more to rise. Its importance as an objective point and as affecting the destinies of the war was fully seen by the leaders of both the contending powers. Jeff. Davis aforesaid fully realizing the importance of Vicksburg as a strategic point, in a speech to the Mississippi Legislature, on the 6th December, 1862, declared—

"That the fall of Vicksburg would cut off their communications with the trans-Mississippi department, whence they drew vast supplies, and would permanently sever the eastern and western portions of the confederacy."

The enthusiastic Sherman with rare foresight, which has been verified by subsequent events, declared in a speech at St. Louis, "The possession of Vicksburg is the possession of America." Grant, as evidenced by all his plans and movements, was of the same opinion. New Orleans was already ours, and Port Hudson, as a consequence of our capture of Vicksburg, soon fell into our hands. From Cairo to New Orleans the great river had been held by the enemy, and the black banner of secession had flaunted defiantly from all its strongholds; but now, thanks to General Grant and his invincible armies, every foot on either shore was wrested from him, and in some fifteen battles, with no serious reverse to our arms, the shattered and dismayed legions of the enemy were driven from their supposed impregnable fortresses to new and interior positions remote from the river, and millions of loyal hearts rejoiced that this great artery of the continent unvexed by treason's barriers was once more, and as we hope forever, free. Scarcely less important were the campaigns of General Grant, terminating in the brilliant victories of Lookout Mountain and Missionary Ridge, and securing to us the permanent possession of Chattanooga, which was regarded by military men of both armies as the next most important strategic point in the rebel States, and it was made the base of that magnificent military movement which is without a parallel in the annals of war, when Sherman and his veteran warriors swept like an avalanche from Atlanta to the sea through the very heart and home of treason.

These successes of Grant in the West filled the nation's cup of joy, and President Lincoln wisely read the nation's will in committing to him the command of all our armies, and particularly of the unlucky but heroic army of the Potomac which, baffled but not beaten, had stood for long years like a wall of fire against the assaults of treason. And here, again, victory followed the invincible Grant, and in a series of battles more bloody than Waterloo, more brilliant than Austerlitz, he displayed the sterling qualities of the great commander. Those forty days of hand-to-hand fighting in the battles of the Wilderness, which carried the army of the Potomac from the Rapidan to the James, amid the fearful shock of brigades and divisions and the onset of army against army along their whole lines, through scenes of fearful slaughter, while the murky air resounded with the thunders of artillery and crash of musketry, and the night was forced to disclose by the lurid light of continued conflict horrid sights beyond all power to tell, bring to the memory the traditions of the fierce wars of the ancients, reminding us of old Marathon:

"As on that morn to distant glory dear,
The camp, the host, the fight, the conqueror's career,
The flying Mede, his shaftless, broken bow,
The fiery Greek, his red pursuing spear;

Now is not the time, nor this the place, but it is for the historian in ample pages to follow the shining record of Grant, written in the triumphs of Henry, Donelson, Shiloh, Corinth, Vicksburg, Chattanooga, the Wilderness, and the siege of Richmond; written in the blood and sacrifices of our living and slaughtered braves, and upon the hearts and memories of the loyal millions who, amid alternate hope and fear, have watched our leader as with resolute front, step by step, he has led the nation through the night of gloom and despondence to the day of final and glorious deliverance.

General Grant possesses personal courage to a high degree. Amidst the most horrid carnage and the wildest tumult of battle, he was imperturbably quiet, his mind clear, scanning critically all movements on the field, and never giving a thought to danger or to death. At the same time if he saw a weak point in his line of battle or a column wavering, where his personal presence might inspire courage, he would fly to that point or dash like a McDonald to the head of that column, plunge into the thickest of the fight, and hold up the standard upon the last outpost of danger and death. No general can command the entire confidence and bring out the full fighting strength who himself has not personal courage, and whose headquarters are not in the field. Men will fight and brave the highest feats of lofty daring, scale the heights, or face the most frowning batteries, when they see their beloved commanders sharing their fortunes in the dread hour of conflict. Understanding this, Grant dashed along the lines at Belmont and had his horse shot under him while rallying his men, who were confounded by the double fury of their foes, suddenly reinforced by fresh battalions, and a terrible storm of projectiles from their artillery at Belmont and Columbus.

On the first day at Pittsburg Landing—a black and terrible day—all day he rode along his decimated lines and inspired the weary troops to stay the stormy tide of disaster which was beating them back through Shiloh's dark and bloody woods to the water's edge. I sat on my horse near him at Port Gibson, upon an eminence where our artillery was posted and where he was exposed to a most terrible fire of the enemy's musketry and artillery. While he was surveying the field and patiently waiting for the assault of Osterhaus's division as it moved upon the main force of the enemy, who had massed themselves in their full strength upon the Grand Gulf and Port Gibson road, suddenly the batteries and musketry of the enemy opened and poured showers of shot and shell and hissing minie balls on the point at which we were posted. I noticed that while a regiment of ours held in reserve at that point, and which was much exposed, was ordered to seek shelter in a ravine close by, Grant, seemingly insensible to danger, quietly smoked his pipe and coolly watched the movements of the contending forces. Only once he said to me jocosely, "Governor, it's too late to dodge after the ball has passed." I watched him narrowly, and the thought of personal danger did not seem once to have entered his mind. As for myself I felt much relieved when after a short interview with General Rawlins, his chief of staff, he said, "Governor, we will go and order Logan up."

Was not his a courageous spirit who, with fame already secure by the bright record of a hundred victories, dared to accept the crushing responsibility of commanding the army of the Potomac, where so many generals had been sacrificed, and where so many bloody reverses had almost dispirited the Army and shrouded the land in mourning? Here he was to confront the flower of the rebel army, led by their greatest commander, who, in their estimation, wore the charm of invincibility. Here he must contend with a foe which, up to this time, had courageously maintained his position, elated by the success of several victories and dashing raids, and who now to the pride of victory had added the fierce courage which despair inspires in men fighting for the last rampart left them by adverse fate. But with the same unselfish spirit which had animated his whole life he did not pause to count the consequences to himself, but came at the call of his country. He accepted the heretofore fatal command, and his watchword was "On to Richmond!" as before it had been "On to Vicksburg!" Self-reliant, he formed his own plans and started out on a route which had already been condemned by our military men. His first battle in the Wilderness appalled the world at the sight of its sanguinary slaughter. I think it almost safe to say that no general living save Grant himself would, after such dreadful slaughter and in the face of so many frowning obstacles, have persevered in the plan which he had marked out for himself. But Grant did persevere. From the beginning his method had been to move on the enemy's works wherever he could find them, and if he did not utterly overwhelm and destroy him in every instance, he yet considered himself successful if he maintained his ground and as much loss was inflicted upon the enemy as he himself received.

Grant's intuition taught him that it was a question of endurance, a contest between the patient, stubborn courage of the North and the enthusiastic dash of the South, and that victory would necessarily reward that party which with greatest loss could yet continue the contest. To him it was the two-handed sword of Cœur de Lion against the flashing cimeter of the Paladin; it was the ax of the Norseman thundering on the light shield of the Saxon or the Celt. I cannot better illustrate his idea than by quoting from his official report, in which, with great clearness, he indicates part of his plan:

"To hammer continually against the armed force of the enemy and his resources, until by mere attrition, if in no other way, there should be nothing left to him but an equal submission with the loyal portion of our common country to the Constitution and laws."

And so, though the first battle of the Wilderness may have been a drawn battle, and though in the second our loss was counted by thousands upon thousands of our slaughtered heroes, though nature seemed in league with treason against us, and frowning batteries, impregnable fortifications, impenetrable swamps, and tangled thickets confronted him at every step of his chosen path, while from the cover of every shrub, tree, and rock an unseen foe assailed him with storms of bullets, and hundreds of cannon poured their murderous fire upon his army, still relying upon himself and his plans with a confidence that was sublime, he pressed forward, and coolly telegraphed to the Secretary of War, "I propose to fight it out on this line if it takes all summer." Sir, he did fight it out on that line, for though Lee, in his blasphemous order of May 14, said, "The heroic valor of this army, with the blessing of Almighty God, has thus far checked the principal army of the enemy and inflicted upon it terrible losses," yet, sir, day by day Lee was driven back toward Richmond, an unwilling witness to the skill, strategy, and tenacity of his unconquerable antagonist. His tenacity of will is wonderful. He is never whipped. If his losses are greater than the enemy, or if he has drawn back, still he is not whipped. He will not admit that there is any obstacle. While the great Lincoln with long strides nervously paced his executive chamber at midnight and mourned as unpropitious to the plans of Grant the storm which beat in mad fury upon the roof and along the corridors and upon the window-panes of the White House, yet Grant accepts the situation, and uses the storms of heaven as his appliances, as he did most effectually on the third day of the battles of the Wilderness. It never could be said of him, as of the great Napoleon at Waterloo, that a shower of rain had lost him a battle.

Mr. President, while General Grant is possessed of extraordinary courage and tenacity of purpose, it must not for a moment be supposed that these constitute his chief claim to greatness. I am here to claim for him military strategy of the highest order; what facts and results have established and what history will proudly vindicate—that wonderful power which so few men have exhibited in the great contests of nations—the genius which with comprehensive glance sweeps over vast fields of conflict, perceives the grand objective points, arranges and combines the proper forces, provides against the contingencies which make up so much of war, carries out every detail of the most complicated plan, and with certain prescience commands all needful agencies to move in synchronous march upon the enemy. The success of his Mississippi campaign is not to be attributed to courage alone, but to that grand strategy displayed in a thorough understanding of the plans, positions, and movements of the enemy, and in making such a disposition of his own forces as to employ and thwart the enemy at every point, and yet to keep pressing inevitably and irresistibly forward upon his own line toward Vicksburg, the objective point of all his operations. It was not simply to drive the enemy from Belmont, Island No. 10, Fort Henry, Memphis, and to fight his way straight down the Mississippi by storming him in every stronghold—this he could do with his invincible legions of the Northwest, and this he did do in a series of shining victories which blaze on the annals of history—but he had also to take in his plans a vast territory of hostile States; the Cumberland, the Tennessee, and the Arkansas, from their mouths to their headlands; and to cut off the enemy in all lateral directions upon his interior lines, keep up his own baselines, and leave no enemy in his rear to overrun Illinois, Missouri, and southern Kentucky; and he displayed the greatest military genius by such a disposition of his forces and such timely movements as not only to carry victory along the banks of the Mississippi, but to carry it in a broad belt on either side, until finally he could and did concentrate all the divisions of his army in the overthrow of the rebel Gibraltar—Vicksburg.

His decisions were rapid and quick; he laid the whole field before him clear as a map, and turned the severest reverses and most formidable obstacles to advantage by instant and rapid combinations. It was my good fortune to witness his operations before the capture of Vicksburg. Having succeeded with great labor and difficulty in transporting his troops through intricate bayons and swampy roads to a point below Vicksburg, he conceived the bold strategy of supplying them with stores and heavy ordnance and with transportation of the troops by running his gunboats and transports by the batteries at night. The precipitous cliffs for miles above and below the city were lined with tiers of heavy artillery and rifle pits swarming with infantry down the water's edge.

Every preparation had been made for the perilous enterprise. Night closed in with rayless darkness. I stood with Grant upon the deck of a small steamer in the middle of the Mississippi, from which he kept an eye to the movements of his fleet. It was then I saw sights men rarely see. Eight gunboats and three transports dropped quietly into the channel and floated down the current. Suddenly the batteries and rifle pits opened their simultaneous fire, while the gunboats returned from heavy guns broadside after broadside upon the devoted city. The whole bluffs were a blaze of fire. Indeed, sir, it looked as if a mighty wall of lightning from earth to sky stood still and motionless, while deep thunders rolled, reminding one of the scene—

"When Jove from Ida's top his horror spreads:
Thick lightnings flash; the muttering thunders roll
Wide o'er the field, high blazing to the sky;
And o'er the forest rolls the flood of fire;
And 'dreadful gleamed the face of iron war!'"

Our boats, contrary to my expectations, safely passed below, and so far Grant's strategy had not failed. But still great obstacles confronted him, and he must resort to new strategy. Before he could attack Vicksburg from below, Grand Gulf must be taken. Grand Gulf was a strongly fortified position at the mouth of the Big Black river, and here Grant gave a striking display of his strategic skill, which attracted the attention of military men everywhere, and which proved to be a pivot upon which turned the mightiest events, results, and destinies of the war.

On the morning of April 29, the six gunboats moved down the river to the assault, while the transports with the troops on board followed, ready to debark and storm the heights as soon as the batteries should be silenced. Our gunboats, under the command of that great naval commander, Porter, ran close inshore under the enemy's guns within pistol shot and poured their broadsides upon his works, to which the enemy responded with a terrific fire from the throats of his heavy guns on the heights above. From a tug-boat in the middle of the stream we witnessed the scene. All around, distinctly visible to the naked eye, we could see the cannon balls flying through the air and skipping in wild leaps along the surface of the river, while—

"Howling and screeching and whizzing
The bomb-shells arched on high;
And then, like fiery meteors,
Dropped swiftly from the sky."

But the batteries could not be silenced, and Grand Gulf could not be stormed. After four hours' bombardment we boarded the flag-ship Benton, and Grant, after a short interview with Admiral Porter, seemingly on the instant decided upon a coup de main, which proved his power as a strategist, and from the jaws of defeat he snatched the standard of victory. He ordered his troops to debark and marched them to a point below Grand Gulf, ran the batteries with his boats, embarked his troops again, crossed the river, and fought the battle of Port Gibson, gaining the first of that splendid series of victories which terminated in the fall of Vicksburg. Here again Grant adapted himself to the circumstances of the case, and made a plan of his own contrary to that which had been laid down for him at Washington. I presume General Grant never received a higher compliment or one that he so much prized as one contained in a letter of Mr. Lincoln of July 3, 1863. Mr. Lincoln said:

"When you got below and took Port Gibson and Grand Gulf, I thought you should go down the river and join General Banks; and when you turned northward east of Big Black I feared it was a failure. I now wish to make a personal acknowledgment to you, that you were right and I was wrong."

Grant had great confidence in the pluck and mettle of his army, and he considered the victory was half won whenever he made up his mind to let the brave Illinoisans and other troops of the Northwest go into the battle. His policy was to "let 'em fight," and to fight the enemy wherever he could find him. Still it cannot be laid to his charge that he was reckless of the lives of his officers and men, for he never asked them to go where he was not willing to lead. In the battles of the Wilderness he did not, as has been charged, run heedless upon the intrenchments of the enemy. He resorted to flanking movements, concentrating his strength first upon one wing and then upon another; or, having divided the forces of the enemy, he threw his whole force like an avalanche upon the center, and drove him back to new positions, until, dispirited and besieged, the confederate capital fell like ripened fruit into his hands.

When he assumed supreme command as Lieutenant General he changed radically the whole plan of our military operations. He discontinued the plan of independent spasmodic movements by our different armies—a plan which had enabled the enemy to move as upon a pivot, and to confront our divided forces now at one point and then at another, and to baffle us by a superior concentration of his forces. But, sir, I read from his own report to show what this policy was which all now see was necessary to turn the tide of fortune in our favor. He says:

"I therefore determined first to use the greatest number of troops practicable against the armed forces of the enemy, preventing him from using the same force at different seasons against first one and then another of our armies, and the possibility of repose for refitting and producing necessary supplies for carrying on resistance."

The anaconda of which so much had been said early in the war was no longer a myth. If he was not the author of the comprehensive idea conveyed by that word to the public mind he was the first to vitalize and make it real. He did not simply move forward the army of the Potomac, but for the purpose of employing the enemy at every point and preventing the concentration of his forces upon any given point, General Grant set in motion all the armies of the Union—Sherman against Johnston; Butler moved up the James, Sigel up the Shenandoah valley, Banks against Shreveport, Sheridan against Early, and other generals in their appropriate places, in the mighty drama which ended in the death of the rebellion.

Mr. President, when the history of this war is carefully read with the map of the campaigns before you; when all the details of departmental organization are understood; and when all the orders, correspondence, and dispatches are properly weighed; when all the coöperative movements of the various divisions of his armies are carefully studied; the vast territory he had to overlook, to conquer, and to defend; vast communications by land and water; immense supplies and transportation to be provided; a confronting enemy ever vigilant, brave, confident, commanded by skillful leaders; and all the splendid results of his great plans are considered, we may truthfully pronounce him the model commander of the age in which he lives. I know well the secret of his power, for when I saw him at headquarters, upon the march, and on the battle-field, in his plain, threadbare uniform, modest in his deportment, careful of the wants of the humblest soldier, personally inspecting all the dispositions and divisions of his army, calm and courageous amid the most destructive fire of the enemy, it was evident that he had the confidence of every man from the highest officer down to the humblest drummer-boy in his command.

He also judged men with the most unerring accuracy, so that when the choicest with him he always selected the right man in the right place. Need I mention Sherman, McPherson, Meade, Hooker, Hancock, Thomas, Howard, Logan, and many others who were relied upon by him, each for some particular excellence or fitness assigned a specific duty? With what sagacity, too, did he select those two gallant chieftains, Grierson in the West and Sheridan in the East, as avant couriers to herald his own mighty coming.

It is needless to recount here the details of Grierson's grand raid, in which, with three regiments only, he suddenly abandoned all communications with his base and supply trains, almost without artillery, and beset on all sides by hostile forces, and, subsisting entirely upon the enemy's country, he swept through the confederacy, cutting telegraph lines, destroying railroad communications, burning depots of military supplies, and spreading dismay among the people, and after destroying millions' worth of the enemy's stores, marched into New Orleans, with streaming colors and glad music, amidst the wild acclamations of the army of the Gulf.

I need not refer to Sheridan. His heroic deeds outshine the romantic stories of the past, when mailed knights fiercely strove with gods around the walls of Troy. Such was Grant's confidence in Sheridan that it is said he hardly ever gave him an order in detail. When he asked the privilege of attacking the enemy in his stronghold at Winchester, Grant's simple order was, "Go in." And on another occasion he said to Sheridan, "Go and whip Early." It is said that Napoleon was greatly disturbed and uneasy during the battle of Bautzen, until he heard the sound of Ney's guns thundering on the left, when he sat quietly down and wrote Marie Louise the victory was gained. Such confidence as Napoleon in Marshal Ney, Grant had in gallant, glorious Phil. Sheridan.

The American people have not lavished upon their heroes costly presents or princely estates, nor stately pile nor royal titles, such as England bestowed upon her Marlboroughs, her Nelsons, and her Wellingtons, but for their great services this nation has conferred upon Washington, Jackson, and Taylor a position of more value than heaps of shining gold and prouder than that of emperor; and monarchs may well envy them the title of citizen President of the United States of America.

Who among the long roll of honored names has achieved a grander success or given to his people a nobler boon than Grant? Black-visaged war desolated the land; horrible dread froze up the fountains of hope; from every house went up to heaven wails for the loved and lost, louder than Israel for her first-born; and from foreign despotisms came the shouts of exultation over the fading fortunes of our great experiment for universal liberty. And when there was no eye to pity or arm to save, suddenly a light gleamed athwart the sky, hope banished sickly fear, order was where confusion reigned, and victory snatched our chastened nation from the jaws of ruin and clothed her anew with the garlands of immortal youth; and the people saw high above the common plane their two deliverers, Lincoln and Grant. Alas! how soon the dread javelin seeks the shining mark and leaves but one. Long may he wear the charmed life; Ithuriel-like, within our Eden, be "armed with a spear of celestial temper."

And now, sir, why should we not eagerly seize the opportunity to confer upon General Grant the grade of General of the armies of the United States? It was conferred on Washington, and who will say it was not justly and worthily bestowed? Then why shall we do less to him who dared all and conquered all in a darker and grander crisis of our fate? If it is objected that we should not lavish honors and emoluments upon one where all, officers and privates, have done so well, I reply, if reply is necessary, that in honoring him we honor all his comrades in arms, and I am sure that not one, from the highest officer, from the great Sherman down, down through all the ranks to the humblest private soldier, will say no to this tribute to the exalted worth of their great commander.

I repudiate the imputation of prodigality of the people's money in advocating the small appropriation proposed to be added to the salary of General Grant by this bill. While I believe this grateful and magnanimous nation will not object to this almost nominal increase of his salary, I believe they are also willing to be taxed to the extent of making all our soldiers equal in bounty and pay for their services in rescuing the country from total ruin, and for that reason I desire to vote for any measure that will accomplish that measure at the earliest est possible moment. If this Congress should issue one hundred-year bonds, with interest, to be appropriated to the support of our wounded and penniless soldiers and of the widows of such as died by disease or wounds in the service, and for the liberal education of the orphans of our poor dead soldiers, do you suppose our nation would be any poorer for such a boon to its brave defenders who saved its very life? No, sir, but far richer, for then, indeed, would this nation be strong in a race of heroes; every cabin would be a fortress and every woman a soldier; and while our posterity, who had the principal of the debt to pay, would celebrate the achievements of the men who had borne aloft the flag, they would also indorse the acts of the statesmen who had done some little to reward the heroes who had offered themselves a willing sacrifice upon the altars of patriotism and liberty.

It has come down from age to age, as the shame of the ancient republics, that they were ungrateful to public benefactors; that those who had borne their eagles farthest over conquered kingdoms, or rendered most service to their country, either in the field or council chamber, were the most liable to censure, ostracism, and even death to gratify the popular caprice. The poet thus characterizes this popular caprice in the sudden transfer of the popular favor from the defeated Pompey to the victorious Cæsar, by words put into the mouth of a tribune of the people, who says:

"Wherefore rejoice? What conquests brings he home?
What tributaries follow him to Rome,
To grace in captive bonds his chariot-wheels?
You blocks, you stones, you worse than senseless things!
O, you hard hearts, you cruel men of Rome,
Knew ye not Pompey? Many a time and oft
Have you climbed up to walls and battlements,
To towers and windows, yea, to chimney tops,
Your infants in your arms, and there have sat
The live-long day, with patient expectation,
To see great Pompey pass the streets of Rome;
And when you saw his chariot but appear,
Have you not made an universal shout,
That Tiber trembled underneath her banks,
To hear the replication of your sounds
Made in her concave shores?
And do you now put on your best attire?
And do you now cull out a holiday?
And do you now strew flowers in his way
That comes in triumph over Pompey's blood?
Be gone;
Run to your houses, fall upon your knees,
Pray to the gods to intermit the plague
That needs must light on this ingratitude."

Mr. President, never let it be said that this Republic shall incur the shame of ingratitude to public benefactors which spreads a cloud over the bright glories of the great republics of the past.

But, Mr. President, I should not finish the picture were I to stop here. Grant is free from inordinate ambition, and from many of the faults and vices which have sullied the characters of many others who have been chronicled as great men in history. He is an honest man; he is gentle and kind, magnanimous to the vanquished; of rugged virtue; stern simplicity; plain, republican manners; true to freedom without regard to caste; spotless purity of life, and elevated devotion to country, standing out before the world as Washington and Lincoln stood, an ever-present and sublime illustration that exalted greatness and exalted goodness are one and inseparable.

I do not wish to deal in panegyric. I know that Grant cares as little for it as any man. He never sought glory. There is nothing about him of the pomp or vain-gloriousness or glare which men call glory. All that he desires is truth. He is the last man who would have ascribed to him achievements which he never wrought, or praise for words he never uttered. As we look upon that calm, reticent, statue-like figure, it is hard to realize that he is the man who stood self-poised and unmoved by the discordant elements of the great revolution through which we have passed, and with the certainty of fate directed the destiny of a continent. But time, which at last sets all things even, will reveal him to the world and blazon him greater in history than Alexander, whose ambition the conquest of a world did not satisfy; greater than Cæsar, who sacrificed the glory of republican Rome for the pageantry of universal empire; and greater than Napoleon, who bartered the victories won by the sword for the vain magnificence of the imperial purple.

Grant welcomed the end of conquest as a national blessing. His name will go shining down the ages lustrous with the halo of great achievements and of great beneficence, without the stain of selfishness; and will be enshrined in the hearts of the coming millions as the man to whom we are most indebted for the success of our arms, the triumph of truth and liberty, and the preservation of our national Union.

Mr. GRIMES. I notice that in the twenty-seventh line of the committee's amendment this language is used: "and the said General may appoint upon his staff such number of aids," &c. I suppose the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs does not claim that the General would have the authority to appoint officers in the regular Army. I suppose the committee intended to use the word "select," and not "appoint." I propose, therefore, to amend the amendment by striking out the word "appoint," in line twenty-seven, and inserting, "select from the line of the Army for service;" so as to read, "and the said General may select from the line of the Army for service upon his staff such number of aids, not exceeding six, as he may judge proper, who shall each have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry," and between the words "who" and "shall" I move to insert "during the term of such service."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I move further to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "cavalry," at its close, the words, "during the term of such staff service;" so as to make that portion of the amendment read:

And it is hereby provided that in lieu of the staff now allowed by law to the Lieutenant General, he shall be entitled to two aids and one military secretary, each to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel of cavalry during the term of such staff service.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In compliance with the order of the Senate, the Chair will announce the appointment of Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. DOOLITTLE, and Mr. NESMITH, as the committee of conference on the part of the Senate on House bill No. 387, being the Indian appropriation bill.

MAIL SERVICE TO CHINA.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 98.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is in order, which is Senate bill No. 387.

Mr. CONNESS. With the consent of the friends of that measure, I should like to get a vote upon the resolution that I have named. It has been already discussed in the Senate, and, for my own part, I do not wish to say anything more upon it. It will only occupy a few moments, and I am very anxious to get a vote upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is it?

Mr. CONNESS. It is the joint resolution in regard to the China mail service. It has been lying over now for about three weeks.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand that that measure will not occupy the attention of the Senate for more than a few minutes, in all probability, and I am willing that the order of the day shall be informally laid aside in order that it may be taken up.

Mr. CONNESS. I only wish to get a vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By common consent, the unfinished business may be laid aside. No objection being interposed, it is laid aside; and it is now moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 98.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 98) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China," approved February 17, 1865; the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. WILSON to strike out all after the word "that," in the third line of the resolution, and to insert:

The Pacific Steamship Company is hereby authorized to establish a monthly steamship line between San Francisco and the Sandwich Islands, instead of touching at Honolulu, as required by law, with their steamships engaged in carrying the mails between the United States and China.

Mr. SUMNER. This question is not free from embarrassment, especially where one is in favor of the line to Japan, and also in favor of a line to the Sandwich Islands, as is the case with myself. I am anxious to see each of these lines established—believing as I do that each is important to the general welfare and especially to the commercial interests of the country. But strong as is my desire, I have not been able to see how the line to Japan can be advantageously held to turn aside and stop at the Sandwich Islands. To bring these two objects into one voyage is not unlike the idea of the elderly person who wished her Bible to be the smallest size book and the largest size type. The two things do not go together.

And yet, sir, I confess that the interest which I take in the Sandwich Islands inclines me to do all that I can to strengthen and increase our relations with them. I do not forget that these islands, though originally discovered by a British navigator, are mainly indebted for their present civilization to the United States. Missionaries of our country have planted churches and schools at an expense of at least a million dollars. One of our countrymen, the late John Pickering, of Boston, the eminent philologist, invented the alphabet by which the native language was reduced to a written text. The whalers of New England have made these islands a resting-place. Our ships on their way to China have made them a half-way house. Of all the foreign ships which reach there five sixths are of our country. Such are the ties of beneficence and of commerce by which we are bound to these islands. There is no other nation that has an interest in these islands comparable in character or amount to ours. Meanwhile the native population has been constantly decaying at an annual decrease of eight per cent., so that I presume now it is not more than fifty thousand.

This brief review will furnish a glimpse of our interest in these islands. They are the wards of the United States. We cannot now turn away from them. The Government must add its contribution also. It is on this account, that I have heard with pleasure that a national ship, under the command of one of our most intelligent officers, is to be stationed at the Sandwich Islands. Her presence there will exercise a salutary influence in sustaining the interests of our people. This is something. But I confess that I should like to see these islands bound to our continent by a steam line.

While confessing this desire, and giving my reasons for it, I am not satisfied that it is proper to require the Japan line to perform this service. It is clear from unanswerable testimony that the stoppage of this line cannot be effected without such a deviation as materially to interfere with its operations.

The testimony presented by the report is positive. Here, for instance, is what is said by that eminent authority, Admiral Davis:

"These considerations, with regard to the eastern voyage, appear to dispose of the whole question.

They show that touching at the Sandwich Islands, on the return from China, would prolong the voyage so many days unnecessarily that an additional line of steamers must soon be established, provided the intercourse between China and America is to acquire that importance which is confidently expected."

This concerns the voyage from Japan to San Francisco. But Admiral Davis is also against stopping at the islands on the outward voyage.

It seems clear, then, that the Japanese line, in order to be effective and to accomplish what is so much desired, must be left to itself without being obliged to turn aside for any incidental purpose. It must be a Japanese line and nothing else; and you must not forget that just in proportion as you impose upon it any additional obligations you will impair its efficiency as one of the splendid links of commerce destined to put a girdle round the globe.

I am ready, therefore, to release the Japanese line from stopping at the Sandwich Islands; but at the same time I declare my hope that some other means will be found to secure a line to these islands.

In releasing the company from this service, I am willing to leave to them the full subsidy already appropriated. But I think they should be held to shorten their voyage in proportion to the time gained. This provision will remove an objection which has been made. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the resolution:

And provided further, That the schedule time of the route fixed by the existing contract shall be reduced not less than ten days for each round voyage.

I hope that my friend from California will accept this amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I have an advantage over the Senator from Massachusetts in this matter. I have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion to which I think I ought to come in regard to this subject. There are no conflicting interests in my State behind me pulling me different ways. There is no China trade that is peculiar to my State which may be interested in making quick passages; nor on the other hand is there a large whaling interest that may be interested in touching at the Sandwich Islands. I can readily conceive that in the division of counsels there must be among those men who approach the Senator from Massachusetts on this subject, it is difficult for him to reach an accurate conclusion, even according to his own judgment, because it is the interest of the large wealthy men in Boston and New York, who have houses at Canton and Shanghai and Hong Kong and other Chinese and Japanese ports, that there should be as speedy a passage as possible from San Francisco to their respective houses on the west coast of Asia; and if you could approach those gentlemen in New York and Boston who are interested in those houses I suspect you would find that they would be unanimously in favor of such a proposition, and so far as their influence goes in the Chamber of Commerce in New York, I have no doubt it has been exerted in favor of such a proposition; but go to New Bedford and Provincetown, and among the commercial men where wealth has not been so greatly concentrated as it has been in New York and Boston, and I apprehend you will find that there there is almost a uniform sentiment in favor of this company being compelled to maintain its original contract and touch at Honolulu.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator if that is not a very good argument in favor of this resolution—the fact that men who are interested in attempting to build up this trade see the necessity of quick passages. The object of the subsidy was to build up the trade.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not think it is a good argument in favor of the measure. I think the interest of the Government would be most subserved by requiring these parties to perform their contract and touch at both places precisely as they agreed to do. What difference does it make to us whether the steamers of this company, which must make, according to the terms of the contract, twelve round trips in the year, make the passage in thirty-one days between

Hong Kong and San Francisco, or make it in twenty-six days? It may be some advantage to a particular man on our eastern coast; but it is of no particular advantage to the Government, so far as I can see. While it is an advantage to one particular man that there should be that speedy communication, it is an advantage to fifty men that the vessels should touch at Honolulu. The navigation of the country, the commerce of the country, and the naval interests of the country, as I undertook to show when this subject was under consideration before, require that these vessels should touch at Honolulu, for that is the great rendezvous of the whaling commerce, and at which nearly every whaling vessel that we have in the Pacific touches; furnishing an opportunity to the commercial men in Maine, in Massachusetts, in Connecticut, and in Rhode Island, to communicate with their vessels that are employed in the Pacific ocean.

Mr. President, it is rather too warm to discuss this subject much to-day. I have only to say that the issue is fairly presented before us, whether or not we shall allow this exceedingly rich company, that has entered into a contract with us to perform certain services upon payment by us to that company of half a million dollars a year, to be released from the terms of that contract, without any attempt hardly to perform the contract, without having, at any rate, attempted to make a single trip, without consideration, and without restoring to us or proposing to restore to us any portion of the half a million of dollars which we have agreed to give them provided they will fulfill their part of the contract.

Mr. President, I had occasion the other day to see some comments that were made upon an observation that I dropped in the Senate here, that it was very important that these packets should be compelled to touch at Honolulu on account of the interest that our Navy had in the subject; and I believe there were some remarks that indicated that that was a most extraordinary proposition. Why, sir, Great Britain requires her vessels to touch at not less than fifteen different ports for no other purpose than to keep up a constant communication with her naval vessels throughout the world; and, as I said then, the fact that we shall thus be enabled to communicate with our naval vessels at the Sandwich Islands and in those seas, was one of the reasons why I was reconciled to the passage of the original bill over a year ago. Now, sir, suppose we pass this resolution; what does the Senator from Massachusetts tell us? He says that he trusts that he shall have the privilege at the next session of Congress of voting another subsidy to establish a line between San Francisco and Honolulu.

Mr. SPRAGUE. That is the intention, I believe.

Mr. GRIMES. And I understand from the friends of this resolution that that is the intention. There is the issue. I have nothing further to say upon it.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, I had the opportunity to advocate this measure originally, and to represent it next to the then chairman of the Post Office Committee, Mr. Collamer, who is not now among us. It has been a long time desired by the people of the commercial cities of the East and the far West to establish a communication, that should overcome competition on the part of England and France, from our western coast to China and India. The original bill was framed with that purpose, and at the same time the Sandwich Islands were embraced. The spectacle was then presented of legislation by persons who were not practical masters of the particular subject-matter. I was not, nor was my colleague, Mr. Latham, who was then in the Senate with myself, when the measure was first introduced, practically acquainted with the subject. It turns out to be true that by the laws of the winds and the waves it is much more convenient and much more economical to go by a far northern line; that is to take two turns.

One is the great circle which makes a shorter distance between the two extremes, as known to all persons who know anything about navigation; and then the currents of the Yellow and North Asiatic seas throwing themselves on our western coast, carry them down; and it makes a much shorter trip from Victoria, the principal possession of England on our western continent, than it would be if we had to run by the Sandwich Islands on the route to Hong Kong or Shanghai.

The object of this amendment is to enable our vessels to run to Japan and China and the Indies and compete with the vessels of two European Powers that have already been put upon the sea. The subsidy afforded is nothing in comparison to the interest engaged. If it should be true that a subsidy will be asked for to carry the mail from San Francisco to Honolulu, it would not be a bad policy. We have got many lessons to learn yet. We ought to learn lessons from the history of States where the science and art of government and public policy are cultivated. There would be no question about this if it were a measure before the British Parliament, because the economy and advantage of a direct line, so as to compete successfully with France, would establish the conclusion itself, and the giving of $50,000 as a subsidy for a mail between San Francisco and Honolulu would be a mere bagatelle. We have (and I choose to say it now) lost much in being afraid to embark in enterprises in the way of development and in the way of profit and in the way of trade.

This enterprise is one in which the people of our whole country are interested. If it can be improved so as to out rival Great Britain and France, it should be so improved. The measure as it is now proposed will enable us to out rival them on the Pacific ocean. There is the greatest field there is in the world for great enterprise. The wealth of China and the wealth of the Indies we have hardly touched. We have never commenced to command it. We are in a position to command the wealth of China and the Indies, and all policies tending thereto should be pursued with carefulness and with earnestness; and this is one of them. Those persons who say now that they can better compete against opposition by abandoning this idea of touching at Honolulu are men of experience. The Chamber of Commerce of the city of San Francisco are men of eminent ability; and they and the Chamber of Commerce of New York and commercial men—for it is a question of commerce to begin with—know more about these things than men who are mere speculators in this Chamber. My opinion is that it would be for the advantage of the country to release this company from this obligation; and when they are released from the obligation, then I or my colleague or somebody else will ask for a communication with Honolulu.

Mr. CONNESS. I was enabled to get this resolution before the Senate this morning by the kindness of the Senator from Michigan, and others interested in the pending measure, and therefore cannot be provoked into a lengthened discussion upon the subject.

I was a little surprised, and at the same time pleased, to discover the real secret, perhaps, of the opposition of the honorable Senator from Iowa when he was upon the floor. He stated that he was unembarrassed upon this subject; that he did not come from a State that had anybody in it interested in making short voyages to Japan and China, or from there to the United States; nor was he embarrassed by having anybody in his State interested in making short voyages between San Francisco and the Sandwich Islands. I regret very much that considerations of that kind should enter into the discussion of a subject of the magnitude of the one that we now have before us. From the isolated position that I myself occupy in the Union, as a citizen of California, if I were to pursue the same rule, I should be at times illiberal and ungenerous toward many other States of the Union, and toward some of the mightiest interests belonging to this nation. If, for instance, I pursued the policy of saving the greatest amount of money in the present hour and at the present time and at the present day to the people that I in part represent here, I would vote against all protective duties, because there is no State perhaps in the Union where there is less capital engaged in manufactures than in the State that I represent, the State of California. There are no people in this Union that pay so high a tax proportionably to their numbers in the shape of imposts upon goods sent into the State for consumption. But, Mr. President, in my votes upon that subject I am not guided nor governed by what I call the immediate interests of the people of California, but feel myself rather controlled to support a policy which is the best policy for our nation, the best policy for every part of it, and eventually the very best and wisest policy and the highest statesmanship for California—that policy which shall induce them to vary their industry, to invest their capital in manufactures, and to become eventually their own suppliers and the purchasers from their own people.

But, sir, enough of that. It appears to me that that policy should govern us in all things, and I wish it did govern all in regard to the questions that come before the American Congress. We should then have less of State rights; we should have less of particular measures in support of particular interests than we now have. We have now before us a measure which contemplates, what? Merely making a short voyage to the ports of Japan and China? Merely making a voyage to the Sandwich Islands? No, sir. The object and purpose of the establishment of the great line that we are now discussing was that it might grasp and seize from foreign hands the mighty trade of the East Indies and deposit that trade at a near and early day in the hands of our people and nation, thereby enriching us, according to the calculations of wise men, a hundred or a thousand fold.

But, sir, it happened that in the contract originally made this line was required to stop at the Sandwich Islands; and now a release is asked from that part of the contract because it is found that it will extend the voyage so as materially to embarrass, if not entirely defeat, the great project and measure. But, say gentlemen, if these parties are released in this respect they should also consent to the reduction of the subsidy that they obtained from Congress in the contract existing. Why, sir, I would agree to that instantly, and favor such a proposition; nay, would have introduced it originally, if by the release the expenses of these voyages, the expenses of the great crusade against other nations for commercial supremacy in those great oceans were to be reduced; but the fact is that they are to be increased; and if the amendment proposed to be offered by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts be adopted, reducing the time within which those voyages shall be made ten days or eight days or seven days, necessarily the speed will be increased upon those ships and the expenditure proportionably increased; so that in place of making cheaper voyages to this company, you make at once more expensive voyages to them; for no person here, I apprehend, is such a tyro in reference to the management of a steam marine as not to know that in proportion as you increase the speed you likewise, proportionally, increase the expenditures.

But there is a fear that we may be asked hereafter to make an appropriation of $50,000 per annum for a connection between San Francisco and the Sandwich Islands. Mr. President, I do not appear here in behalf of the company who have made this contract; but I appear here in behalf, and speak in behalf, of the great interests that induced the establishment of the line and the making of the contract; and if the success of that great measure is to depend upon this release, and upon a subsequent appropriation of $50,000 annually, I say it is but a mere bagatelle compared to the great national gain. We talk of passing measures for public improvement for the purpose and with a view of increasing the national resources. I ask gentlemen whose object it is to bring money into the Treasury of the United States what measure can be proposed that will accomplish that with more certainty than giving us supremacy in these new commercial fields.

But, Mr. President, I cannot pursue this line of discussion or take up the time of the Senate. I am only astonished that any number of Senators should be found who would oppose the proposed release, for it is virtually an opposition to the very purposes of the establishment of this line.

The honorable Senator from Iowa, when he was on the floor, told us that the British Government required their ships to touch at their naval stations. They do require some of their ships to touch at naval stations in the West Indies and elsewhere; but which of their steamers do they require to touch at those stations? Are they those engaged with rival lines seeking for commercial supremacy? No, sir. And you might as well require and expect this line to fill the purpose of its institution by stopping at the Sandwich Islands as the British Government should expect to maintain the supremacy of the Cunard line and at the same time require them to touch at the Bermudas or at Nassau.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator be good enough to inform me what rival line there is from San Francisco to China?

Mr. CONNESS. The rival lines to this are already in existence, and have been for years and years, and the Senator must know it. The time made by one of the rival lines, now, from Shanghai to London is fifty-five days, by way of the Isthmus of Suez. The time made by another line, by way of Marseilles, is forty-seven days. Give us this release; give this company an opportunity to plow the deep at the rate they will by this grand line, and your passage will be made from Hong Kong and Shanghai to San Francisco in less than twenty days, and from San Francisco to New York in twenty days, making forty days altogether, thus at once, and before the construction of the Pacific railroad, overcoming the European lines. Why, sir, we are now receiving from those parts of Japan and China the silks and the teas that are laid down in New York through English merchants and paying profits to English merchants in that trade. Is there anybody who cannot favor the change of these great commercial currents? A grasp of the subject seems to me to be only necessary to see the great advantage.

But the Senator fears that we shall call for $50,000 annually for steam communication between San Francisco and the Sandwich Islands. Well, Mr. President, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

On one point more a word, and I am done. This company did not bid for this contract at less than the subsidy offered. They would not have made a bid for less. They had no competitors, although it was advertised for months and announced that it would be given to the lowest responsible bidder, which proved that no other company would engage to do the service for the subsidy offered. They not only engaged in it, but engaged in it upon a scale that is creditable to the American name and character and to the age in which we live.

I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] will not be accepted by the Senate. I am willing to accept, so far as I am concerned, the amendment offered by the other Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] but would advise that in place of reducing the time ten days he reduce it eight days. It is the object of the company, I say to him and to the Senate, to make the least possible time. They are building the ships to do it with, and they will not fail of success if you give them the incentive.

Mr. SUMNER. In selecting ten days, I rather followed what seemed to be the testimony of Admiral Davis; I thought that possibly ten days would not be too much; but I wish to make the provision one that shall be agreeable to the Senator from California.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator that his amendment amounts to nothing, because the bill itself under which the contract was made only provides for twelve round trips, and does not fix the time within which they shall be made. To make the time ten days shorter than nothing would amount to nothing.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say that the length of the voyage from the port which these ships shall leave to the port at which the goods are delivered is the point that commerce seeks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This amendment does not reach that at all.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Iowa suggests to me that if I require two additional trips I shall accomplish something; but that would be obviously requiring too much.

Mr. GRIMES. Why so? If, as the Senator says, Admiral Davis thinks they can make ten days' shorter time than they would make now, then the time gained, twelve times ten, would enable them to make two additional trips and have some extra time left over.

Mr. CONNESS. I think Admiral Davis's calculation was seven days, not ten.

Mr. GRIMES. That would enable them to make two additional trips, and have ten days left over.

Mr. CONNESS. I think that this whole matter can be left with the greatest possible safety to the company that have engaged in this business. The Senator from Maine smiles. I am convinced, nevertheless, from my acquaintance with the scale on which they are entering on this work, that their object, their determination, is to make it a success over other nations, and that, without any restriction, they will reach the goal of success.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, I will take occasion to remark here that there has been a struggle on the part of Great Britain and on the part of France and on the part of Russia to obtain command of the commerce of the Pacific, and, obtaining the command of the commerce of the Pacific the command of China and India. We have been at fault in not maintaining a positive policy. Our diplomatic relations with the countries on the Pacific have not been equal to those of other States. It is time that we should go to work to maintain ourselves firmly there and command that commerce. A gentleman who went from Boston to China, an eminent merchant, was at Hong Kong, where he talked with a tea merchant from the interior who was worth a hundred millions. Said he, "You must be a very important man in your part of the country." "No," he replied, "the salt merchants do not recognize me." Sir, the silver and gold of the world have been poured in there for eighteen or twenty centuries. They are there now, and the trade of those countries is sought for by all the intelligent States of Europe. Portugal made great efforts for it at one time; Holland did at one time; England has done it since; and France is trying for it now, as she has got relations with Siam. We have by right, by right of power, the command of China and India and the islands of the Pacific—the greatest field for commerce that the world has known.

Questioning about these small things is questioning about cents when millions are involved; and a subsidy of $500,000, in regard to its relations to our country and its wealth, is a mere bagatelle. What is the wealth of our country? It is the wealth of individuals, not the wealth of the State, for from individuals in a republican Government comes the material that makes and maintains the State. If we can command the commerce of the Pacific we shall command a wealth that cannot be responded to by any part of Europe, and by our communications with Europe can make it our own, possess it ourselves; and every enterprise that tends in that direction is strengthening our Republic.

It is not worth while to argue this matter in extenso. Argument will have no effect upon those who have not studied political economical science well enough to know that development is wealth, that the wealth of the individual is the wealth of the State, that the wealth of the community is the strength of the community. We now owe, say, three or four thousand million dollars. How are we going to pay it? By taxation on a circumscribed line? No. It is by bold, brave enterprise, by bringing the wealth of other lands and making it subject to our own land; and those who do not understand the philosophy of that policy have lost the lessons of history. It was done in old Rome; it was done in Greece before; England has proved it well; it has been our own sound policy, but we have not yet been bold enough to throw off the shackles on our enterprise. Out of enterprise grows wealth; out of that grows strength; out of that grows the power of the Government. It has been so all through history. If we could only indoctrinate into this Government the policy that England adopted long ago of subsidizing vessels to run to all the ports of the world so as to command their commerce, England would be but simply an island in the sea, and we should be the great nation of the world. That is all we want to do; and if we are wise we shall do it. It is written in every book, it is the deduction of every sound thinker who studies political economical science. We have got the power, we have got the opportunity, to command both the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans and the Indian sea, and if we do not do it we shall be false to our own great office.

Mr. WILSON. I have, what the Senator from Iowa says he had not, a strong pressure from two classes of men in my section of the country who are interested in this line. The one class desires the quickest communication with China and Japan, and great interests are involved in that. The other class desires communication with the Sandwich Islands, and they are very earnest and pressing in securing that communication. Now, I am desirous of securing both of these ends. I believe that this steamship company has entered upon this work with the highest purposes and with the resolution to achieve the quickest communication with China and Japan. My colleague is about to modify his amendment so as to require the company to make annually one more trip between California and China. That will accomplish the desire of the commercial men of the country, and in fact of the whole country, that the most rapid communication that can be made shall be made between the Pacific coast and China and Japan.

Now, sir, I propose to change the amendment which I offered the other day requiring this company to put on a line between San Francisco and the Sandwich Islands; I propose to modify it by giving for this service an additional subsidy of $50,000 annually.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Chair understands that this is a modification of the Senator's previous amendment.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so modified. It is in the Senator's power to modify it, no action having been taken upon it.

Mr. SUMNER. But, as I understand my colleague, he will now move his amendment as an addition to the resolution, not as a substitute for it. As it was first offered it was a substitute.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly my object is to move it as an additional section.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. WILSON as modified, which was to add the following as an additional section to the resolution:

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the Pacific Steamship Company is hereby authorized to establish a monthly steamship line between San Francisco and the Sandwich Islands, instead of touching at Honolulu as required by law, with their steamships engaged in carrying the mails between San Francisco and China; and for the service thus required there shall be allowed an additional sum of $50,000 annually.

Mr. WILSON. It may be that Senators think this is making an appropriation of $50,000 that we ought not to make. I certainly think we ought to deal generously with this company. We ought to encourage them in the work they have undertaken, and undertaken on a larger scale than we expected or than we required of them. If now we require them to make one more trip a year, and also require them to make communication with the Sandwich Islands so that both objects will be attained, I think an addition of $50,000 annually is a very small matter, and I think that we had better settle it now, than to wait for legislation at the next session of Congress. Let the country understand that we have settled this whole question, and that communication with China and with the Sandwich Islands is to be completed at the earliest possible day.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to modify my amendment and put it in final form. I withdraw the amendment which I offered and submit this to come in at the end of the resolution:

And provided further, That in addition to the twelve round voyages now required, one additional round voyage shall be required.

Mr. CONNESS. There is only one objection that I see to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] in its present shape; and that is that it will bring on this company what of course they would not prefer, the charge that they undertake to monopolize the control of all the Government subsidies in the Pacific ocean. There are other steamship owners both East and West who, if there was an opportunity to bid for a short service to the Sandwich Islands, might, perhaps, bid for it, though I doubt very much whether any would at the amount proposed by the section offered by the honorable Senator, namely, $50,000 a year. The service has generally been estimated to be worth about seventy thousand dollars. I have no doubt this company would be willing and able to perform the service for the additional compensation proposed; but they would not prefer, and do not prefer, to enter upon it, because they are now engaged in the great line from San Francisco to New York by the Isthmus of Panama; and when you add to that the business of their line from San Francisco to Japan and China and the field to be traversed by it, the amount of capital engaged, you will see that their hands are already sufficiently filled. If there is any project that they look to beyond these two, it is eventually to putting on a line of their own across the Atlantic, so that passengers may go upon their ships either in Europe or at China and go through by their lines.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] that as I understand his amendment, it does not secure the trip to the Sandwich Islands.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, a monthly line.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. You authorize the company to run such a line and propose to give them $50,000 if they do; but there is nothing making it obligatory on them that they shall do it, nothing making it a condition of releasing them from making the Sandwich Islands a point on their round trip that they establish this line.

Mr. WILSON. I have modified it so as to read, "authorized and required."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. How can you require an outsider to do anything? You may make it a condition that if they do not do it they are to be still held to their former contract. You may authorize me to run a line from San Francisco to the Sandwich Islands, and say you will give me $50,000 a year if I do it, but if I do not choose to do it you cannot make me do it.

Mr. WILSON. This is a joint resolution proposing to change the terms of the original contract. The first section states the change that is to be made, releasing them from the requirement of stopping at the Sandwich Islands. Then this section comes in which makes a new contract, and that is, that instead of stopping at Honolulu, as was before provided, they are authorized and required to run a monthly line to the Sandwich Islands, and for that service they are to receive in addition to what they now receive the sum of $50,000 annually. I think we shall secure both objects by passing it in this form.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I think I understand it. The Government has made a contract with this steamship company that they shall run a line of vessels from San Francisco to China, passing by the Sandwich Islands, and that for that service they shall receive $500,000 a year. A contract has been made to that effect. Now, the first section of this resolution proposes to release them from that contract so far as it requires them to touch at the Sandwich Islands. The second section, which is offered as an amendment, authorizes and requires them, as modified, to establish a new line from San Francisco to the Sandwich Islands; but when you change the original contract and do not make the new requirement a condition, a part of the contract, and have their assent to it before the old contract is changed, you do not hold them to it. There cannot be any doubt about the proposition. You propose to them that they shall do this; you say they shall; but it is not made a condition of the change of their contract.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator will have my amendment read, I think he will see that it is so.

Mr. FOSTER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) I move that this resolution be recommitted to the committee that reported it and that the subject be postponed until the next session of Congress, the first Monday in December next. I make this motion, not because I am hostile to the measure in either of its aspects; that is, with reference to trade between this country and China and Japan, or trade between this country and the Sandwich Islands; but friendly to both, and am desirous that the interests of both should be promoted to the extent of our power.

It is very apparent that this measure is not matured with reference to both these aspects. As they now stand, they are antagonistic. They can, as I believe, be harmonized and made to promote each other. As the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] has just suggested, the proposition to allow or rather to direct this company to send monthly a steamer from San Francisco to the Sandwich Islands, imposes no obligation, but as that section now stands it would be optional with the company to accept or refuse that and to go on with this contract as we shall modify it; that is, to perform a part of the service which they contracted to perform at the full price.

Mr. McDUGALL. I wish to make an inquiry as to a principle of law. Would not this measure, if passed now in this form, make a provision that would govern the whole contract, if accepted? If they accepted it, they would be held to accept it subject to this condition; or if not, the old contract would stand.

Mr. FOSTER. I should doubt it.

Mr. McDUGALL. I think that is unquestionably the law.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt the law can be so framed as to work out that result; but I do not think this resolution does it now. My object in making this motion is that the measure may be referred to the committee; and as the honorable Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] suggested that this company do not wish to monopolize the whole matter of carrying mails in the Pacific, the Post Office Committee on conferring with the Post Office Department may come to the conclusion that it will be advisable to advertise again for proposals for carrying the mail from San Francisco to the Sandwich Islands, and so make a new contract for this portion of the service. Meantime there is no injury either to the Government or to this company by allowing the matter to stand over until the next session, for by the original contract, entered into under the law of February, 1865, nothing is to be done by this company for the Government until after the 1st of January

1867. By the second section of the act of February 17, 1865, it is provided:

"That any contract which the Postmaster General may execute under the authority of this act, shall go into effect on or before the 1st day of January, 1867."

It is not until after the 1st of next January that anything is to be done. We are, therefore, really delaying nothing in the strictest sense; we are simply postponing the matter as it now stands, so that we may be prepared to perfect it before, under the terms of the contract, they shall begin to execute it.

I submit, then, that in order to harmonize these interests, to promote, as it is the object of us all to promote, trade and commerce between the Sandwich Islands and the Pacific coast, and between the Pacific coast and China and Japan, we should postpone the resolution, recommit it to the committee, and ascertain whether there will not be, as I have no doubt there can be, an entire unanimity of opinion arrived at as to how these conflicting interests may be harmonized. It is most desirable that it should be done; that instead of being made antagonistic they should be made really promotive of each other.

Sir, the Postmaster General does not in his letter intimate that there is any haste about action in this matter. On the contrary he says distinctly in his letter as given to us on page 6 of the committee's report:

"In determining the question when the company's steamers shall be relieved, if at all, from calling at the Sandwich Islands on their voyages in either direction, it should be borne in mind that, until the completion of the Pacific railroad, the general interests of commerce will not be materially advanced by permitting the steamers to take the direct route either way."

That is a most significant remark. Why should we relieve this company from a portion of the contract most desirable to be performed, if it is not to facilitate commerce in another direction? No doubt it promotes the interests of the company to diminish their expenses, while you allow them the same rate of compensation. The company are no doubt watchful of their interests; but we should be watchful of the interests of the Government and of the people; and the Postmaster General says distinctly that the interests of commerce will not be materially promoted by taking a different route either way until the completion of the Pacific railroad, "as prior to that time"—he now goes on to give the reason—"the line between China and Europe, via San Francisco and New York, will not be an equal competitor in point of expedition with the existing lines between Europe and China via Suez."

I know that my enthusiastic friend on my left [Mr. CONNESS]—and intelligent as he is enthusiastic—thinks that we shall at once, by this direct route, distance all competition either by way of Marseilles or by way of Suez; but the Postmaster General thinks otherwise, and it is possible that the honorable Senator from California may be mistaken. At all events I think this officer at the head of the Department, having all the facts before him, speaks in such a way as that we should give heed to what he says, especially when this contract does not begin to be executed until after January 1, 1867, by its own terms.

Mr. President, I repeat that I believe, and must believe from the evidence here before us, that the interests of the country, the interests of commerce, the whaling interest, the commercial interests between China, Japan, and the United States, the trade in teas, silks, and all kinds of merchandise will be promoted by having this resolution recommitted to the committee and something more perfect and mature presented to us than we have now before us. It is, perhaps, not quite impossible at this stage of the session, when the thermometer ranges as it does, to perfect the details of this measure, but it is most inconvenient, and wholly unnecessary, as it is not to go into effect until after the 1st of January next. I submit, therefore, with great confidence that it will be the part of wisdom to recommit the resolution. Nobody's interests will be prejudiced, and nobody will be delayed; but the prosperity as well as the comfort and interest of all will be promoted.

Mr. McDougall. Mr. President, there is a disposition exhibited on the part of Senators, I think, to delay matters of great moment. They complain of the extreme heat and the condition of the climate. Well, remove the seat of Government to Boston. That will correct that difficulty. On our tables and in committees are matters of the gravest importance, and this is one of the most grave import. This is not a measure that is to transpire in 1867 but at the present time. The gentlemen engaged in the enterprise are having their ships upon the sea. The enterprise has already commenced. There is no controversy that I know of between any interest at the Sandwich Islands and the making of the trip by the north. I do not know of any conflicting interests; but if there be any they are all accommodated by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson,] which provides for communication with the Sandwich Islands, which amendment I approve. Five hundred thousand dollars subsidy and $50,000 in addition is a small amount for this Government to expend every year. Twice that much to establish ourselves on the Pacific coast, which must be the greatest source of our moneyed wealth, would be not too much for the object in view.

I do not believe in this policy of adjourning important questions because the thermometer stands at ninety-eight degrees. We came here to transact the public business, and I myself desire to see it transacted. I will not run away if the thermometer gets to be one hundred and fifteen degrees. I have seen worse than that.

The measure is of the first importance. As I had occasion before to state, Russia and France and England are struggling for ascendancy on the Pacific, and we are substantially doing nothing. They have been doing everything by their diplomacy, by their appropriations, by their expenditure for the purpose of subsidizing communications. It is not worth while for us to be slow if being fast is right. I have always heard that the American people were a fast people. When we get to be a slow people we had better go and marry ourselves to the Chinese. I protest against the policy of postponing measures when there is no reason for it. There is no controversy about this question among the friends of the measure. The $50,000 suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts as a subsidy for a Sandwich Islands line answers the whole question and furnishes the communication. Fifty thousand dollars goes out of the pocket of the Government every five minutes and accomplishes no such result as is contemplated by this enterprise. I cannot see the wisdom of throwing off our shoulders the responsibility of action upon great questions that involve policies which concern the general welfare and prosperity of the nation.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall only occupy a moment.

Mr. HOWARD. Let us have a vote.

Mr. CONNESS. I am compelled necessarily to ask the Senate not to agree to the motion to postpone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to recommit.

Mr. CONNESS. The postponement was included. I hope the Senate will not do this. I thank the honorable Senator from Connecticut for his compliment to myself. It was not intended to be much of a compliment.

Mr. FOSTER. I intended all that I said.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no doubt that the Senator intended all that he said in his allusion to his "enthusiastic friend." I thank God that I have been blessed by Him with some enthusiasm planted in my nature. It is a quality that I would not be without. There is something generous in it. It adapts us to something outside of what concerns ourselves and fits us for many of the offices that life imposes upon us. It is very often suspected shrewdly that the very useful quality of sense is regulated somewhat by it. Perhaps it is. I have great enthusiasm on the subject of this great project, as I have called it.

The Senator has read from the letter of the Postmaster General, and called our attention to the remarks made by him, in the letter, touching the importance of the change to be made before the Pacific railroad is constructed. In what connection are those remarks made? I will show the Senate. The central idea on which he bases the attempt to establish this line is the eventual transfer of the center of the exchanges of the world from London to New York. That cannot be accomplished now, as I stated when I was up before and on a former occasion, by releasing these ships from stopping at the Sandwich Islands now, nor before the Pacific railroad shall be constructed. But, sir, it is not less certain that the great advantage can be gained that I pointed out, namely, that of making more rapid voyages from China and Japan to the city of New York than are now made from those ports to the city of London; and that was all that I claimed. The Postmaster General in his letter alludes to this in another paragraph, and says:

"It will be seen from the foregoing that the primary object in commending to Congress the grant of a subsidy was to establish, under the sanction of the Government, a first-class American line of mail steamships between San Francisco, Japan, and China that would successfully compete with the British steamship lines via Suez for the commerce of the East, to the end of practically placing the United States between the eastern continent and Europe, and transferring the commercial center of the world from London to New York."

That was the object of the line. But in another respect we are to have either a gain or a loss by refusing to act upon this subject now. How, sir? I will tell you. I stated it upon a former occasion. By the existing contract, this company were required to construct steamers of not less than three thousand tons. Two of those steamers are now being constructed. Their hulls are nearly completed. Their steam-engines are being made. They are to be of four thousand tons, a thousand tons each greater than the requirement of the law. It is important that the other two to be constructed for this service, for they are to be constructed immediately, (their places being supplied in the mean time by two of their finest vessels on the Pacific side, nearly new,) shall be constructed of the same size, namely, four thousand tons burden. But if we refuse to make this release now, there will be no certainty that it will be granted, and before the 1st of January, 1867, comes around the contract for making the two additional ships to complete this great line must be executed, and they are at a loss to know whether to go on with the line upon the magnificent scale on which they have begun or to reduce the vessels to the contract size, and thus be required to put off their two great ships upon another service and construct four new ships of a more limited size. This is one of their greatest purposes in seeking the release now. Having explained that to the Senate, I will not detain them longer, but hope we shall take the vote seriatim upon the amendments now before us.

Mr. HOWARD. I gave way upon the request of my friend from California and yielded the floor in order that this resolution now before the Senate might be acted upon, supposing it would consume very little time. The order of the day was the Northern Pacific railroad bill. I hope the Senate will come to a vote upon the measure now before it, and let us then proceed to take up the Northern Pacific railroad bill again and dispose of that. I really cannot give my consent to any further loss of time on this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FOSTER] to recommit the joint resolution, with the amendments, to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, with instructions to report at the next session of Congress.

Mr. GRIMES. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Cowan, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Kirkwood, Morgan, Norton, Pomeroy, Riddle, Salisbury, Sherman, Sprague, Turnbull, Willey, and Yates—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Creswell, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Harris, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Poland, Van Winkle, and Wright—12.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.]

Mr. SHERMAN. What is that amendment?

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to add at the end of the joint resolution the following proviso:

And provided further, That in addition to the twelve round voyages now required one additional round voyage shall be required.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] to add the following as an additional section:

And be it further resolved, That the Pacific Steamship Company is hereby authorized and required to establish a monthly steamship line to carry the United States mails between San Francisco and the Sandwich Islands, instead of touching at Honolulu as required by law, with their steamships engaged in carrying the mails between the United States and China, and for the service thus required there shall be allowed an additional sum of $50,000 annually.

Mr. HOWE. I think that amendment needs further amendment. I am not prepared to state what it should be. I agree with several Senators who have spoken, that it imposes no obligation upon the company as it now stands; that they would be at liberty to repudiate that contract, and that you will still be bound by the release you have executed. I think it had better be referred to a committee. From what committee does this measure come?

Mr. FOSTER. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. CONNESS. A vote has just been taken on such a motion, and it was voted down. I hope the motion to refer will not be made.

Mr. HOWE. I understood the motion just voted upon to be to refer and postpone.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that motion will not be made again. It will be very easy to amend this section so as to make it a condition of the release.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is a condition as it stands.

Mr. CONNESS. But it can be made plainer.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is an absolute condition as it stands.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to have it reported again.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I am told by the Senator from Massachusetts that there is no doubt but what that is a condition to the first section. I respectfully submit that there is very grave doubt about it.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator will allow me, I will move an amendment to make it clear. I move to insert after the word "required" the words "as a condition of this release;" so that it will read:

That the Pacific Steamship Company is hereby authorized and required as a condition of this release to establish, &c.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to make this inquiry: suppose they do not do it, what is the penalty?

Mr. McDOUGALL. The law does not go into operation.

Mr. GRIMES. Exactly; but I suppose the purpose of the Senator from Massachusetts is to compel it to go into operation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask, if anybody can inform me, whether there is any estimate as to how much this subsidy ought to be. Is it mere guess-work? Who knows whether it is too much or not?

Mr. CONNESS. I will answer the Senator. An offer was made recently by the California Steam Navigation Company to do this service for $70,000 annually. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes to require, as a condition to the release, that this company shall do it for $50,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How do we know, then, that $50,000 is enough?

Mr. GRIMES. The truth is that neither of the propositions of the Senators from Massachusetts amount to anything, so far as this will operate authoritatively and compel this company to do anything. Suppose the company do not consent to be required to do this, then what? Exactly what the Senator from California said would be the result; they will not put on this line. Then the Senator will have gone off shearing and come back shorn himself.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me inquire of the Senator from Iowa how he would contrive to compel any contractor to perform his contract. He would not take him by the hand and force him to do it. He acts under his liability to the law.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, the Postmaster General has entered into a contract with this Pacific Mail Company to do certain work. Now, we come here and say that that company shall be required to do certain other work upon our paying $50,000. Does the Senator from Michigan insist that we have a right to do that? The proper way is, as I understand it, to refer this matter to some agent of the Government to reduce the contract to writing, giving to our agent authority to expend $50,000 annually for this purpose, if we see fit. If the Senate do not propose to postpone the consideration of this resolution until the next session, and I see that that is the sentiment of the Senate, the proper way is to commit it to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and let them put it into shape and report it back to us in the morning. Then we shall have the resolution in a condition in which we can understand it and know what we are voting. I do not propose to make any such motion myself, but I hope it will be made and adopted.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa, who is a lawyer and I know can answer me exactly, is not that an absolute condition of the law as it stands now? Is there any question about it? Can you start a question about it? Is it not the condition of the law now?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Why is it not?

Mr. GRIMES. I suppose that this is an entire new proposition that we proffer to this Pacific Mail Steamship Company. We authorize and require them to put on a line. The terms of the proposition are not that we authorize and direct the Postmaster General to enter into a contract for the purpose of subsidizing another line. If we are going to put on a new contract there that is the way it ought to be framed, so that there shall be a competition between this company and others. The bill ought to be referred to the committee and let them put it into some form.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it is intended to make this last section a condition of the law, it had better be so expressed; otherwise it will not have that effect.

Mr. CONNESS and Mr. STEWART. It is so expressed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Do I understand that the friends of the measure desire the adoption of this section?

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly; we have no objection to it at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I want to ask a further question: is it probable that $50,000 is too high for that service?

Mr. McDOUGALL. No.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is it $50,000 for each trip?

Mr. STEWART. Fifty thousand dollars for each year for running monthly trips between San Francisco and the Sandwich Islands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is it probable that they will perform the service for that sum?

Mr. STEWART. If they do not, they do not get this law.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not see why we cannot vote upon it now. Certainly we can understand that proposition very well.

Mr. CONNESS. There is no reason why we should not vote upon it at once. The opposition is made for the purpose, unquestionably in part at least, of opposition. I ask the Secretary to report the amendment again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts accept the modification of his amendment suggested by the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported as modified.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further resolved, That the Pacific Steamship Company is hereby authorized and required, as a condition of this release, to establish a monthly steamship line to carry the United States mails between San Francisco and the Sandwich Islands, instead of touching at Honolulu, as required by law with their steamships engaged in carrying the mails between the United States and China; and for the service thus required there shall be allowed an additional sum of $50,000 annually.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "and for the service thus required there shall be allowed an additional sum of $50,000 annually." The original contract required both these services to be performed. Now, if the company prefer performing part of the service and putting on a line from San Francisco to the Sandwich Islands, to run monthly, so as to give twelve trips, making twelve communications with the Sandwich Islands, it will, in fact, be doing what they contracted to do. If they prefer to do that rather than to run according to the contract, I am willing, for one, that they should do it; and if they are not willing to do it, I am not willing to make the change.

Mr. STEWART. The resolution now requires an additional trip of them.

Mr. FOSTER. If this amendment shall be adopted, I shall be willing to strike that out. I would not impose another trip upon them. Let the contract stand as it is. If they, instead of performing the contract as it stands, are willing to put on a monthly line from San Francisco to the Sandwich Islands, and also run their line direct from San Francisco to Japan, I am perfectly willing to allow them to do it; but to pay them full price for half the service, because we are paying away $50,000, as one gentleman has said, every five minutes from the national Treasury, and to add another $50,000, I am not willing.

Mr. CONNESS. The object of this amendment is very palpable. It has been presented to the Senate with some clearness that this company never would have made a bid for the service to Japan and China at less than $500,000. In proof of that, although advertised for months, no other person or company made a bid, and they made no bid for less than that sum. They are now building ships costing $1,000,000 each, and we are to palter with the company that is entering upon that great service for the amount of $50,000!

Mr. FOSTER. I am not disposed to question the liberality or the princely magnificence or munificence of this company; and I am not disposed to palter with them or with anybody else; but as guardians of the public Treasury I think it is not to be considered mean if we refuse to vote away $50,000 without the slightest possible consideration or reason. This proposition is simply a donation to this company of $50,000 on a contract; and that is the whole of it. It may be mean to decline to agree to it. I must stand the charge of meanness if it be so, for I do decline. I know of no reason on earth why the Government of the United States should give $50,000 to this company over and above what they have agreed to give on an honest contract, which the company do not claim they cannot perform and make money on, which by its terms the company are not to begin to perform until next January. We propose now to give them $50,000, preliminary to their beginning to perform it; and to palter with this company the Senator thinks is very improper.

This company, it seems to me, do not place themselves in a very enviable position by coming before this Senate and asking the Senate, nearly one year before the time when their contract was to be executed, to relieve them from the performance of at least one third of the expense they incurred, without diminishing one dollar of the amount of money to be paid. Why cannot this company have a little of this princely magnificence and say, "Inasmuch as we ask the Government to relieve us of one third of the expense, which, by the terms of the contract, we were to be charged with, if Government will relieve us, we will perform the residue of the service for two thirds of the amount of the contract." Why do not the company do that? Is the Government of the United States paltering with them because we hold them to a contract which they do not claim is a heavy one?

The honorable Senator says they would not have offered to make this contract unless they had supposed they were going on the direct route from San Francisco to China or Japan. Did this company make this contract openly, avowedly, in writing, plainly, explicitly, with a secret reservation that as soon as it was made they would get it altered? Is that what is meant by their understanding of the contract? Surely the contract was a straight contract enough. There is no doubt about what the contract means. This company were required by their contract to go from San Francisco by the way of Honolulu, to China and Japan, twelve times, if I mistake not, per annum for $500,000. Now, they come here, and the honorable Senator says that that is a very round-about way to go to Japan, and they want to go to Japan, and they want to go in a straight line, instead of going round by Honolulu. Mr. President, was this munificent company composed of landlubbers who did not know the way by water from San Francisco to China and Japan when they made their contract? Did they not know something about the great circles and Maury's charts of the sea and the difficulty of getting to China by way of the Sandwich Islands as well when they made this contract as they do now? Why, sir, it looks to me, the more I examine this matter, as though, had it been made further down East, we should have talked about some little Yankee trickery in a contract of this kind; and that they made a contract in this way with a view, after it was done, of being relieved from the onerous and burdensome part of it, and holding on to the part that was profitable to the company. That may be a most ungenerous suspicion; but when the gentleman talks about the Government paltering with the company because we refuse to give them a douceur of $50,000, I think it is as well to look the whole contract over. But for the stipulation that the steamers should touch at Honolulu, out and back, I would not have voted for this subsidy in the outset—without that stipulation, I do not believe it would have passed Congress. It is an important part, to my constituents the most important part of the service.

Now, I say, Mr. President, that it is fair to treat this company just according to the terms and sense of the contract, saying to them, "You have made this contract; now go on and perform it." If you find at the end of it, or at the end of one year, that there has been something mysterious which we did not know when we began, which calls upon the Government, acting liberally, honestly, and fairly, to make an additional appropriation to them, I shall be one of those, if I should chance to be here, who will vote to pay them an additional price over and above the contract price, if it appears that the contract has proved a hard one for the parties under circumstances which they could not reasonably foresee. But when the contract stands as this does, perfectly fair, open, honest, and above-board, for us now to give them $50,000 more by way of addition before they begin to perform it, is throwing away money; and it is not, as it seems to me, the most liberal course or the most upright and honorable for this company to ask it at the hands of this Government.

Mr. CONNESS. I would not say one word more on this subject were it not for the fact that all that the Senator has said is based upon an assumption of the Senator's own, namely, that in making this release the company are relieved from one third of the expenses of running the line. Who told the Senator that that was so? Certainly it does not appear in the report made. I presume that the Senator knew that of his own knowledge. He assumes it merely; but I say to the Senator that he is entirely mistaken. Here is San Francisco on the map that I have before me; here are the Sandwich Islands; and here is Japan, the next point to be touched at.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senator says that I assume that this proposition relieves the company from one third of the expense of running the line. I may have used one third as an illustration, not meaning of course to speak of that as the precise sum. He assumes, however, that I assert of my own knowledge, without any evidence, that this is relieving the company of a portion of their expenses. I beg leave to read the last sentence of the letter of the Postmaster General, to be found on the sixth and seventh pages of the report:

"The facts, however, must not be overlooked, that by adopting the shortest routes the company will be relieved from heavy expenses in the coaling, &c., of their steamships for four days' steaming in one direction and three days in the other, in addition to the cost of the necessary accommodations at the port of Honolulu."

That may be all a figment of the imagination, possibly, too.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, it is a figment of the imagination, whether it comes from the Postmaster General or the honorable Senator or any one else. There is nothing better known by the merest tyro in connection with nautical affairs and with the running of steamships than that when you are compelled to increase the speed you increase the consumption of fuel, not in a small ratio, but in an extraordinary ratio. If this company are compelled to touch at the Sandwich Islands, speed at once is set aside; they do not enter upon the race at all, but make slow voyages. If, on the contrary, a release be granted, then they at once take the short trip, put on steam, increase their speed, increase their expenses, and in place of relieving them from expense the release absolutely increases their expenditures. There is nothing more certain than that. It is an error that the Postmaster General might have very readily fallen into; for though an enlightened officer, and I will say the most so perhaps that ever was placed at the head of the Post Office Department, it is very easy for him to be mistaken or to fall into the error that the Senator has fallen into, doubtless in the same manner, that because you shorten the voyage you therefore reduce the expenses. Sir, I would not vote to release this company from touching at the Sandwich Islands upon any condition unless it shall be a condition that shall compel them to make more rapid trips, thereby increasing their expenditures.

Mr. FOSTER. It was a little unfortunate, that being the state of things, that the joint resolution, as reported, did not provide for anything but the same number of round trips per annum that the original contract provided for; and so far from making it necessary that the steamers should run faster, they might have performed their contract and run slower; and for aught that the contract or that the joint resolution reported by the committee would impose on the company, they could save money in two ways: first, by not having to run so many days, and secondly, by running even at a less speed than before.

Mr. CONNESS. I will simply say, in reply to that, that had I, or the committee, the slightest doubt that this company were engaged in the true spirit of the undertaking, in a great work, more anxious than the Government could be to make it a great success, that condition would have been imposed; and as soon as it was presented or even spoken of by the honorable Senator, he will bear me witness that I at once accepted it.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I am sorry that the discussion of this question has elicited any particular heat and warmth of debate owing to the thermometer. The honorable Senator from Connecticut, whose voice I am always glad to hear in the discussion of these questions, as we hear it so seldom—

Mr. FOSTER. Some things are to be prized on account of their rarity.

Mr. NYE. The honorable Senator from Connecticut has seemed to assume that this company has been guilty of some wrong, or that they made a contract which they themselves did not understand. I do not think that either of those facts exists. This company made a contract to run ships of three thousand tons burden by way of Honolulu to China, touching at Japan. In commencing their operations they were met by the fact that the British Government, with more formidable ships than theirs, was competing for the mastery of this trade; and they at once in a spirit, I think, of great magnanimity, instead of a spirit of meanness or a spirit of ignorance, set themselves to work to build ships of a thousand tons burden more, thereby increasing the cost of the ships largely, for the purpose not only of performing their contract with the Government, but of doing what is more essential to this country, controlling the commerce of that great eastern country. I have no particular friendship for this company, and do not know them except as a company. I know that such a company exists. But I assert that instead of its being any evidence of their meanness or any evidence of their ignorance, they have attempted to rise to the importance of the occasion and to do for this country what it is most anxious to secure—the control of the commerce of this eastern country.

Now, sir, I do not think it even partakes of Yankeeism (and being a Yankee I have a right to speak as freely on that subject as the honorable Senator from Connecticut) when they build ships a thousand tons larger than they agreed to do. They have not only done that, but instead of acting anything but the part of magnanimity and honor they come here, in advance of the time, as the honorable Senator from Connecticut says, to lay this state of facts before the Congress of the United States, and ask it to relieve them from that portion of the contract requiring them to touch at Honolulu. Why do they ask that? Does the honorable Senator assume that it is because it is simply and solely a question of profit to them? I answer that that is not fairly inferable at all. They undoubtedly can make this trip quicker, and I will assume for the purposes of this argument a little cheaper, by running direct instead of round about by Honolulu; but, sir, they hold out to the Government this great incentive: they say the Government is threatened with opposing lines to control this great commercial intercourse of this country.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NYE. Certainly.

Mr. GRIMES. What lines are we threatened with now that we were not threatened with at the time this contract was made?

Mr. NYE. I will answer the Senator from Iowa by saying that I read in a San Francisco paper that not only the British Government but the French Government were now in negotiations for the purpose of putting on two lines between San Francisco and Hong Kong, in China. This is the evidence that I have.

Mr. GRIMES. A San Francisco newspaper.

Mr. NYE. Yes, sir, a San Francisco newspaper, as much entitled to credit and which keeps as close a lookout upon the commercial interests of that country as the Iowa papers do for the commerce of the Mississippi, and is as much to be believed. If there was not a newspaper on the earth that had uttered it, if not an individual in this Senate Chamber or anywhere else had uttered it, it is in the logic of the location itself. It is as a matter of course that this great commerce will be contended and contested for.

Now, I say that this company comes here not for the purpose of cheapening their expenses, but to lay the question fairly before Congress, and to submit to them as a great measure of national importance, "Is it not better for you to so alter and amend this contract as to make the most expeditious line to China from San Francisco?" I have great respect for the opinion of the Senator from Connecticut, and great respect for the late Postmaster General, and I shall be pardoned for saying that my respect for him has increased lately; but, sir, I will not refer this question to any Postmaster General that has been or is to be; and the Postmaster General has no more right to speak of the commercial effect of a certain transaction than any man upon this floor. When any Postmaster General attempts to say that because this contract for carrying the mails does not go into effect until a year from this time, its commercial disadvantages cannot be great until that time, he asserts what a true view of the case will not sustain him in asserting.

Sir, this channel of commerce is not a new one. It has been sought for for years. The control of this great Pacific commerce has awakened the cupidity of all the oriental and eastern nations. It is that which placed French troops in Mexico. What the French are now sustaining the empire in Mexico for is to control the great commerce of the Pacific coast. Against that and to prevent that this company have come here, and I say, in a manly spirit, to submit this great question to Congress who are the guardians of every interest of this great nation, and ask them whether it is not better that they shall be relieved from this portion of the contract for the purpose of making it sure that they can, not only by the character of their ships, but by the power and speed which they put into them, control this commerce. I do not see how this company could act more fairly. I think when the honorable Senator from Connecticut says that it is a donation to them of $50,000 he puts it in a very wrong light.

Now, Mr. President, that we should keep up close, intimate commercial relations with the Sandwich Islands is too palpable to need discussion. There they lie right in the middle of the great Pacific ocean, and their fertility is unsurpassed. The variety of their productions caters to every appetite in the enlightened world. That we should seek by every means to obtain the control of the leading commercial interests of the Sandwich Islands, I repeat, is too apparent to deserve a moment's discussion here. How do we propose to do this? By preventing this great company from assuming and obtaining this great mastery by lengthening its trips from three to five days? By no means. But, sir, in order to do this we propose to give this company, as a condition to the alteration of this charter, $50,000 more, and have a monthly communication direct from San Francisco to the Sandwich Islands by another line. What will be its effect? I know that $50,000 is a great deal of money; and I know at the present time, after the large appropriations that have been made, that $50,000 seems considerable money. It is; but, sir, $50,000 is not much money when it is appropriated in such a way as to give us the commercial control of these great Pacific islands. The duties on a single cargo of goods from the Sandwich Islands to San Francisco might be equal to this annual appropriation; at least, it would not be unfair to presume that many of their cargoes would yield half that amount of duties to our Government. If this can be done in the green tree, what will be done in the dry? Looking ten years ahead, this appropriation of $50,000 a year will amount to $500,000. Before that time rolls around, and before the next year shall have rolled around, the custom-house at San Francisco will have received more than what it will receive now under the present circumstances, more than twice $50,000,000 to pay this Government for its encouragement of this great commercial enterprise. Not only that, but it will be evidence to the world that America is going to control the commerce of the Pacific ocean. Sir, it is ours to control, and I submit, with great diffidence and deference to the opinions expressed by the honorable Senator from Connecticut and the honorable Senator from Iowa, that it is a matter of great national economy that we should control it; and that we can at this juncture is as certain as that the sun rolls its rounds.

Now, the question submitted to this Congress is, will we grasp this prize that is within our reach? Will we seize this commercial power while it stands at our door to be seized, or shall we do with it, as I suggested the other day, as we have done with our Atlantic commerce—reduce it to that extent that to-day our mails are carried to Liverpool by British ships? England, wiser than America in this respect, has well earned the name of being the commercial mistress of the seas. England's flag is the master of the sea. It is time now, and the opportunity is presented when we can seize that flag and make it our own.

The honorable Senator from Maine the other day said that these Pacific coast gentlemen were very liberal in their votes and their appropriations. Sir, the Pacific coast, as a people—and I presume they will not feel hurt by my alluding to it—are a pretty liberal people. They have been the sturdiest adventurers upon this continent. They have made that distant country bud and blossom like the rose, and magic-like have their commercial ports sprung up upon that heretofore unpeopled ocean coast. They have battled the dangers of the mountains and the valleys, and they have conquered them all. They have hewn the mountain-side and have filled up the valleys; and to-day, through their enterprise, the whistle of the locomotive is heard upon the dizzy heights of the Sierras. They are an enterprising people; but their greatest boast, after all, is that they are a part of the people of this great Government, warmly interested in its success. Standing every day where they look out upon this vast and inviting ocean and seeing the coming wealth to be acquired from its trade in future years, they come here to their parent Government, to which they are warmly attached, and ask, as is no more than their due, that these great enterprises, if they commend themselves to the judgment of the Congress of this nation, shall be heard, without reproach being cast upon their representatives.

Mr. President, I do not feel like prophesying; it would not become me to do so; but I am satisfied of one thing, that the true attitude to be assumed by Congress on this question is to yield every possible encouragement to control the great interests of the Pacific. Sir, that Pacific coast woke from a long slumber when our armies drove the Castilians out. Where their large league farms were once seen are now seen villages thickly studded with the happy abodes of Union-loving men. The whole coast bespeaks the character of its inhabitants. I submit to the Senator from Connecticut whether he would not rather give $50,000 more, although our expenses are great and our appropriations large, if he was sure that in the future it would give you back the proud privilege of gathering the commerce of those great nations of the East; and this is their natural avenue out if we can control it. I have no feeling particularly in regard to this subject. I have no local feelings. I speak here to-day as a citizen of this Republic when I assert that I believe it to be the true interest of this Government, or any other that desires to be great, to be greater in her commerce than any other nation. The facilities we have; the opportunity is now presented; and it is a question which is submitted to the sound judgment of the American Congress whether they will improve it or not.

Mr. GRIMES. The argument that has been urged in favor of the passage of this joint resolution from the time that it was first introduced, a few days ago, has been, that it was necessary that greater facilities should be extended to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company in order to enable that company to compete with foreign companies; and we have had some very learned and eloquent and able arguments upon the necessity of this country maintaining her commercial supremacy. I judged from the remarks that were made by the Senator from Massachusetts the other day, and by the Senator from California, that we really were in a bad way in that regard; that it might be possible that we should not be able to maintain our present position among the commercial nations of the earth. But when I come to interrogate the Senator from Nevada in regard to the rival opposition that it is said has been started against this steamship company since they entered into the contract by which they agreed to carry our mail to and from China, by the way of Japan and Honolulu, it turns out that he saw a notice in a California newspaper, which looks as sharply after the interests of California, as the newspapers of my State do after the commercial interests of the Mississippi valley, that the French Government and the English Government were about to put on two rival lines from San Francisco—a city in one of our own States—to China; and hence it was necessary that we should furnish additional facilities to this Pacific Mail Steamship Company in order to enable them to successfully compete with those French and English lines that are to ply between one of our own ports and one of the Chinese ports! Really, it struck me that that was an additional reason why we should require one of these lines at least to touch at the Sandwich Islands.

It does seem to me, and I submit that to the consideration of Senators who are here representing commercial interests and who seem to believe that it is only necessary to have communication with the Sandwich Islands on one side—it does seem to me that it is important to the commercial interests that we should have communication with the Sandwich Islands from the west side as well as from the east. It does seem to me that if a whaler goes out from New Bedford to the Sandwich Islands for the purpose of being filled up with bone and oil in the Sandwich Islands that have been brought there from the Chinese seas, it may be important for that vessel to have communication by a steamer coming from the west as well as one coming from the east; but it seems that the Senators from Massachusetts and gentlemen representing commercial cities do not entertain that opinion, and are willing to accept a proposition which will only require the steamships to connect with Honolulu on the east, allowing the steamship company to abandon its contract, which required it to touch at Honolulu going both east and west.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that I am not one of those who think that is by any means a compensation. I think that paying them $50,000 and allowing them to send a steamer monthly from San Francisco to the Sandwich Islands and back will be no fair and full performance of the original contract, by any means. It will not be as advantageous to the Government, not nearly as advantageous to the American interests at the Sandwich Islands, and by no means a full and fair performance of the original contract. Hence, to do the best I could under the circumstances, I proposed to strike out the $50,000, for it is really giving $50,000 for not performing the contract as well as they might do. If they are not to perform the contract as well as they might do, let us pay them the original price without paying them anything more.

Mr. STEWART. I will state that the objection that the Senator from Iowa makes about getting communication from the East to the Sandwich Islands is a matter of no importance whatever, for the reason that the steamers coming from the East will make three, four, or five days quicker time to San Francisco than they otherwise would. It is only about a five days' trip from there to the Sandwich Islands. There will only be a difference of a day or two days in mail facilities from China, and I apprehend that that is not a very important consideration.

Mr. GRIMES. I will suggest to the Senator that it is possible that the steamer going from San Francisco to the Sandwich Islands might not start on the day that a steamer reached San Francisco from China; and they might not possibly make a close connection.

Mr. STEWART. There might be a day or two lost.

Mr. GRIMES. But, Mr. President, I suppose it is a foregone conclusion that this joint resolution is to pass, and I have no disposition to press any further objections to its passage, except that I desire to record my vote against it. I have this to say: when it was first introduced, as I then said, my whole opposition was predicated upon statements that had been made to me by gentlemen connected with the Navy. Since that time I have received a large number of communications from gentlemen connected with commerce, especially from men who are engaged in the Pacific ocean trade, thanking me for my opposition and desiring that I should continue it. I do not feel that I am constrained to do so after the Senators from Massachusetts—a State that owns the principal part of that commerce—have ceased to entertain any hostility to the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Connecticut to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that will not be adopted.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, it is extremely singular how persons are wisely informed about the commerce of the Pacific who could not give the locality of an island in all that vast sea. Its policies and its necessities seem to be without the range of information that generally obtains. I do not complain, because we have been kindly and well treated by the Federal Government, but many Senators take exceptions and raise points in regard to things about which they must be ignorant. The subsidy of $500,000 is not a donation for that service; it is an inducement to furnish that service. I doubted much when that inducement was offered by Congress whether it would induce any one to engage in that great enterprise. This company were induced to engage in it. They sustain a policy which belongs to the public as much as it does to themselves, because we would have no business to pay a subsidy to this line unless it was a public enterprise. It is to command the commerce of the Pacific, to establish our relations with Japan and China, to add to the wealth of the nation, and $500,000 was thought here to be a reasonable sum in payment for it. I did not think then that it was sufficient; I do not think now it is large enough. Eight hundred thousand dollars a year was paid to the Collins line of steamers for running across the Atlantic, only two thirds the distance across the Pacific, and that on a line where there was a very large amount of travel and an established business. I trust this will not be considered as a matter of giving, but as a matter of inducement. To make a rapid line between our coasts and China is of public importance. To establish our relations with the Sandwich Islands is also a matter of importance. As the joint resolution stands, with the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, I do not think that any person can make a reasonable objection to it, because for the $550,000 millions will roll into the public Treasury as the result of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FOSTER] to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clark, Cowan, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Johnson, Kirkwood, Morgan, Norton, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, and Willey—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Poland, and Wright—10.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts by adding as a proviso:

Provided, That the release contained in the first section shall not take effect until said Pacific Mail Steamship Company shall enter into contract with the Post Office Department to make one additional trip to China and Japan, and also a monthly trip to Honolulu, for the compensation provided in the second section.

Mr. WILSON. I accept that amendment as a modification of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question, then, is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was adopted.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Johnson, Kirkwood, Morgan, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, and Willey—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Creswell, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Poland, and Wright—10.

So the resolution was passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 436) to reorganize the clerical force of the War Department, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. VAN WINKLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 133) to change the place of holding the terms of the circuit court for the district of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 90) in regard to rations of Union soldiers held as prisoners of war; and also that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing vote upon the bill (S. No. 343) to quiet land titles in California.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 145) for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas railroad and telegraph; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.
Mr. FESSENDEN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 213) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 62, 113, 116, 117, 122, 123, 136, 137, 139, and 145, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their one hundred and eighteenth, one hundred and thirty-first, one hundred and thirty-second, one hundred and thirty-third, and one hundred and thirty-fourth amendments.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and fortieth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all of said Senate amendment, being section six, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the female clerks and counters employed in the several Departments and bureaus whose appointments are made by the several heads of Departments under the provisions of law, and whose legal compensation has heretofore amounted to $720 each per annum, and the female clerks employed at the Post Office Department shall, from and after the 30th day of June, 1866, receive in lieu of all other compensation an annual salary of $900 each per annum; and the amount necessary to pay the increased salaries herein provided for, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and forty-fourth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In line nine of said amendment, strike out all after the words "authorized to" down to and including the word "due," in line ten, and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "make said adjustment;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the eighty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate agree to so much of the amendment of the House to the one hundred and twenty-fourth amendment of the Senate as is embraced in the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and to and including the word "dollars," in the sixth line of said House amendment; and disagree to the balance of said amendment, and the House agree to the same as so modified.

That the House recede from their amendment to the thirtieth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the sixty-first amendment of the Senate, and to their amendment of the same; and agree to said Senate amendment with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all of said Senate amendment after the word "services," in line five, and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "Provided further, That so much of the appropriation of $250,000 granted by act approved March 2, 1865, for compensation to temporary clerks in the Treasury Department and for additional compensation to clerks in the same Department as remains unexpended, shall be paid to the clerks in said Department of the first and second classes, who have not received any additional compensation out of said appropriation, and who shall have served in said capacity for one year previous to July 1, 1866; and $100 shall be paid to each person employed in said Department, appointed by the Secretary, at an annual salary amounting to less than $1,200, and who shall have served under such appointment for one year previous to July 1, 1866; and if the balance of said appropriation remains unexpended shall be insufficient to pay said clerks and appointees, the sum of $100 each as herein provided the deficiency shall be supplied and paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and forty-second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line five of said amendment insert the following words: "who shall be the draughtsman;" and the Senate agree to the same.

W. P. FESSENDEN,
GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,
T. A. HENDRICKS,
THADDEUS STEVENS,
JOHN A. KASSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 387.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That bill having been informally laid aside is now regularly before the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 387) to secure the speedy construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph line, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to amend one of the amendments of the bill in which the Senate have already concurred. In lines nine and ten of section three, on page 4, I move to strike out the words "the issuing of" and insert after "patents" the words "shall become due," so as to read, "that the lands to which said company shall be entitled shall not be subject to any general or local taxation for any purpose whatever for the period of five years after patents shall become due for the same." It might occur that the company would omit to take out the patents for an unreasonable length of time; hence the necessity of making the exemption to commence from the time the patents are due under the charter. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President—

Mr. SHERMAN. I now submit the motion which I indicated yesterday, to recommit this bill. I have a number of amendments, but I will not offer them until that question is disposed of. I move that it be recommitted to the committee, so that we may consider it during the vacation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Wisconsin. Does he yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. We had better vote on the recommitment. I have a number of amendments which I wish to offer if my motion is voted down.

Mr. HOWE. I have some amendments which I propose to offer before the bill is recommitted.

Mr. SHERMAN. Of course if the Senator is entitled to the floor he will do as he pleases.

Mr. HOWE. I supposed that I was in favor of this bill; I certainly am in favor of the construction of a road to the Pacific through the northern portion of the United States, and I supposed that such a bill was before the Senate as I could support. The Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CRAGIN,] in the remarks he made yesterday, gave me the first intimation I had that there was anything in this bill that was specially objectionable. Since then I have examined the bill, and without some pretty serious amendments I shall be obliged to vote against it, and I propose now to indicate what those objections are which I wish removed. I hope the Senator from Michigan will give me his attention, if no one else does.

In the first section of the bill it is provided that the United States shall guaranty the stock of the company. "Whenever and as often as the commissioners named in the fourth section of the act of incorporation shall report the completion of twenty-five or more consecutive miles of said road," the Secretary of the Treasury is requested "to pledge the credit of the United States in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, to the payment of the interest of the stock of the said company on the portion of said road thus completed, and at the rate per mile hereinafter specified, from the date of the issue of the same and for a period not exceeding twenty years from the date of said issue."

In other words, whenever the company shall have built twenty-five miles of road the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to guaranty the stock of the road equal to the construction as estimated hereafter in the bill, and guaranty the interest on that stock from the date of the issue of the stock; so that if on the organization of the company the company shall issue the whole $150,000,000 of stock receiving the smallest percentage down and subject to call hereafter, whenever the last twenty-five miles is completed, then for a certain amount of that stock, although it may not be completed for fifteen years from this time or from the time the stock is dated, the Secretary is called upon to guaranty interest upon it from the date of the issue of the stock. I think it is sufficient if the interest on this stock is guarantied from the date of the completion of the section, and I shall move to amend it in that particular.

Mr. HOWARD. I supposed that to be the effect of the bill as it stands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So I understood.

Mr. HOWE. I think that is not the effect of it. In line fourteen of section one I move to strike out the words "issue of the same" and insert "completion of said section."

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, pending that amendment, I submit the motion to recommit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have quite a number of amendments to offer; but it is not worth while to take up time with them if the bill is to be recommitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator propose to commit with instructions?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; I move to recommit without instructions.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator to withdraw that motion. I have several amendments which I wish to offer.

Mr. SHERMAN. So have I, and I have more amendments than the Senate is willing to devote time to considering on this bill. I wish to avoid any further controversy, because I believe—I hope at least—that the Senate will let the bill go over until the next session. The motion to recommit will clear this bill out of the way of the other business of the session.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish the Senator from Ohio would withdraw his motion and let this amendment be made. It simply makes the clause more definite and exact in its phraseology and meaning. I think the amendment does not alter the legal effect of the clause, and I am entirely willing to accept the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SHERMAN. I prefer that the motion to recommit be made now. I am notified that other Senators have amendments. There is no use in wasting time with them.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator from Ohio will insist upon his motion and cut off so simple an amendment as this, I am willing to submit it to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have to say, in reply to the observation of my friend from Michigan, that if this bill be recommitted, as he seems to be in favor of the amendment, he will have ample opportunity in committee to amend it in this and several other particulars; and I have some other amendments.

Mr. HOWARD. I am entirely aware of that; but I do not intend, so far as depends on me, to have it recommitted. I think that entirely unnecessary. I understand quite well that the Senator from Ohio is opposed to the passage of any such measure as this, and the recommitment, therefore, is proposed at this time as one of the means of getting rid of the bill and finally defeating it. I do not propose to reargue the whole of the subject at this time on the motion to recommit. The Senate are already sufficiently possessed of the contents of the bill, its object, and the necessity of it, if there be such necessity. I hope the Senate will not recommit the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say, before the vote is taken on this proposition to recommit the bill, that I think it is better that the Senator should prepare his amendments and offer them to the bill. I am prepared, though friendly to the bill, to vote for some amendments which will make some changes in the grants made, but opposed to recommitting.

Mr. SHERMAN. Aside from my opposition to this bill—it is not necessary for me to repeat it—I say in good faith to the Senator that the bill in its present shape would be, I think, a very absurd thing to pass, aside from its general merits, and I have amendments which I did submit to the Senator from California on which I desired the judgment of the Senator from Michigan. When we take this bill up in committee I will submit the amendments to the committee. We shall have ample time to discuss it. No injury can be effected by the delay in the passage of this bill; the lands are still unsold and our Government credit is still unaffected. You will be no worse off in legislating next winter, and I think the loss of a few months in the construction of this work will not be very serious.

Mr. HOWARD. It is certainly not an unreasonable request to make of the Senator from Ohio that he would present his amendments now and let us consider them. My own idea is, that we can very easily perfect this bill, and if it has friends enough in the Senate we shall have time to pass it. It is essential to this company that they should be informed whether it be the purpose of Congress to render them any aid during the present season to assist them in carrying on this great and magnificent undertaking. It is important to them to know whether they can go into the market and borrow money upon anything like reasonable terms, as other railroad companies are compelled to do in order to prosecute their undertakings; and it seems to me that if the honorable Senator from Ohio is in any degree willing to render the company aid by granting the credit of the Government to it, in this or any other form, this is the time when he ought to express it, and certainly the time when the Senate ought to express it. They cannot raise a dollar of money by borrowing in the markets at the present time unless they borrow upon their own individual responsibility, for the reasons which I stated yesterday. The markets are full of the bonds and securities of those other great railroad corporations which we have chartered and which are now engaged in the prosecution of their work, and possess far broader facilities for borrowing money than this road does. I regard this road as necessary to the prosperity of the country and its true interests as even the Union Pacific railroad, and I see no reason for making fish of one and flesh of the other.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion to recommit.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to know whether this motion contemplates the postponement of this measure until the next session of Congress or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. There is no further motion.

Mr. HOWARD. The effect of recommitting will be to throw it over to the next session.

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly that is my purpose. I never conceal a matter of that kind.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the vote is taken, I desire to state that I have paired off on all questions about this road with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. VAN WINKLE.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Kirkwood, Morgan, Kiddle, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, and Willey—20.
NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Cragin, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—19.
ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Saulsbury, Van Winkle, and Wright—10.

So the motion to recommit was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WILSON. The other day, when a debate arose here with regard to the tariff bill, in reply to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] who had referred to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House, Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, I said that Mr. MORRILL had put upon him, by a vote of the House, an increase of duties on iron and on coal. I learn that I am reported as having said "wool" instead of "coal." I certainly could not have so intended, because no such vote was taken. On iron and on coal the House of Representatives increased the duty over the rates reported by Mr. MORRILL. I regret that this mistake should have been made, either by a slip of the tongue on my part or by an inaccuracy in the report. It is more likely that I made the mistake myself. I regret it because I have seen some papers in the country reflecting very severely upon Mr. MORRILL on that subject. I make this explanation in order to put myself right toward him.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. In twenty minutes more we take a recess, by order of the Senate, and as it is necessary that we should have an executive session, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 213) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 90) in regard to rations of Union soldiers held as prisoners of war was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

SOLOMON P. SMITH.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 410.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 410) for the relief of Solomon P. Smith. It directs that there be paid to Solomon P. Smith, late a captain in the one hundred and fifteenth regiment of New York volunteers, the sum of $260, for his pension from the 14th of January, 1865, when he was mustered out of the service, until the 15th of February, 1866, the date of the filing of his application for a pension with the Commissioner of Pensions.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the bill that was specially assigned for to-day at one o'clock, the bill for the equalization of the bounties of soldiers, for the purpose of getting an adjournment upon it, so as to leave it as the unfinished business. It was put aside at one o'clock by the Northern Pacific railroad bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate having made an order to take a recess to-day—

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is not half past four o'clock yet. We want to get this bill up first.

Mr. WILSON. This will not interfere with that order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator's bill should be taken up now, that would leave it as the unfinished business when the Senate comes together again in the evening.

Mr. WILSON. This bill was specially assigned for to-day.

Mr. POLAND. I hope this motion will not prevail. The bankrupt bill was made the special order for yesterday at one o'clock, but was crowded out by the unfinished business of Saturday, and I think I am entitled to have that taken up to-morrow. The assignment of that bill was in advance of the assignment of the bill to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers.

Mr. HOWE. I propose as a compromise that both Senators allow me to make a report.

Mr. WILSON. I merely ask that the bill be taken up now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is in order, and the question is on that motion.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes three—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest to the Chair that the time fixed for a recess has arrived and there is not time to finish the count.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, the Senate will now take a recess until seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. CLARK. I move to proceed to the consideration of the adverse report of the Committee on Claims on the petition of James Larry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the prayer of the petition be rejected.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The next adverse report on the Calendar is report No. 41, in the case of Ephraim Hunt. The committee report that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The next adverse report of the Committee on Claims is report No. 62, on the petition of H. Clay Wood. The report is that the prayer of the petition be rejected.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The next is report No. 66, in the case of Mrs. Catharine Ferguson. The report is that the prayer of the petitioner cannot be granted.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The next is No. 67, the case of O. Holman. The committee recommend that the prayer of the petitioner be denied.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The next is report No. 73, on the case of George Mack, and twenty-five others, enlisted men of company G, eighth regiment United States Veteran volunteers. The committee report that the prayer of the petitioners cannot be granted.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The next is report No. 77, in the case of T. S. Briscoe. The committee report that the prayer of the petitioner cannot be granted.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The report No. 77, in the case of F. M. Faircloth, is that the prayer of the petitioner cannot be granted.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The report No. 81, on the petition of George P. Kensberg is that the prayer of the petitioner be denied.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The adverse report, No. 82, in the case of Eli W. Goff, is that the petitioner's prayer ought not to be granted.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The next adverse report is No. 91, on the petition of C. F. Johnson.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I hope that will lie over.

Mr. CLARK. It may be passed over at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER pro tempore. The report will be passed over.

Mr. CLARK. The next adverse report is No. 92, in the case of Henry Roy De La Reintree. It is an old case that has been a good many times before Congress. The report is that the prayer of the petitioner should not be granted.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The next is No. 93, an adverse report on the claim of Benjamin Tilley. I move that the prayer of the petitioner be not granted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. In the case of D. D. Sublett, report No. 94, the committee recommend that the petitioner have leave to withdraw the petition.

Leave was granted.

Mr. CLARK. No. 95 is an adverse report upon the petition of Joseph W. J. Holmes. The committee report that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. No. 101 is an adverse report on the claim of James B. Johnson. The committee report that the prayer of the petitioner cannot be granted.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. No. 113 is a report on the petition of George W. Tarleton. The committee ask to be discharged. I move that the prayer of the petition be not granted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. No. 123 is an adverse report on the petition of Sarah A. Monaghan. I move that the prayer of the petition be not granted.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY M. WHITTLESEY.

Mr. CLARK. All the adverse reports having been disposed of, I move to take up Senate bill No. 46, for the relief of Henry M. Whittlesey.

The motion was agreed to. The bill provides that in settling and adjusting the accounts of Henry M. Whittlesey, of Michigan, late assistant quartermaster and acting chief quartermaster of the twentieth corps, there be allowed and credited to him or his representatives the sum of $5,000, the proceeds of a draft for that sum from Captain J. M. Blair, commissary of subsistence department of the Cumberland, on the United States depository at Louisville, Kentucky, in 1864; such proceeds having been accidentally and without fault of Captain Whittlesey irrecoverably lost.

Mr. CLARK. The committee report adversely upon the bill. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

EDWARD P. M'KINNEY.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the bill (H. R. No. 354) for the relief of Edward P. McKinney, of Binghamton, New York, late captain and assistant commissary of subsistence, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is an authorization to the proper accounting officers of the War and Treasury Departments to allow to Edward P. McKinney, of Binghamton, New York, late captain and assistant commissary of subsistence, upon the settlement of his accounts, the sum of $475, or so much thereof as the proof shall establish, upon his proving satisfactorily to such officers that that sum was properly paid by him prior to the 13th of August, 1864, to men of the first Rhode Island cavalry, and the first, second, and fifth United States cavalry regiments, and that his vouchers therefor were forcibly taken from him and destroyed by the enemy on the 13th of August, 1864, between Harper's Ferry and Winchester, Virginia, without his fault.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY HORNE.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the bill (H. R. No. 521) for the benefit of Henry Horne was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Henry Horne of the sum of $400 in gold, or its equivalent in United States currency, being the amount advanced by him for the use of Federal prisoners at Andersonville, and used for their benefit while prisoners of war at that place during the years 1864 and 1865. The payment of this sum is to operate as a full release of the note given to Horne by Father Wheelan, under whose supervision the money was expended.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEWIS DYER.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the bill (S. No. 383) for the relief of Lewis Dyer, late surgeon of the eighty-first regiment Illinois volunteers, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts of Lewis Dyer, late surgeon of the eighty-first regiment Illinois volunteers, and allow him the pay and emoluments of surgeon of volunteers, from the 6th day of April, 1863, to the 26th day of May following, deducting therefrom any amount which may appear to have heretofore been paid him by error.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES G. HOLLAND.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the bill (H. R. No. 421) for the relief of James G. Holland, late acting assistant paymaster United States Navy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to credit James G. Holland, late acting assistant paymaster of the Navy of the United States, with the sum of $500, in the settlement of his accounts with the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury; such credit to be given for the sum of $500 in Treasury notes of the United States lost and destroyed without any fault or neglect on his part, but the final order for the allowance is not to be made until the whole subject connected with the said alleged loss shall be fully investigated by the Fourth Auditor, and he shall certify thereto.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LISTON H. PEARCE.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the bill (H. R. No. 517) for the relief of Liston H. Pearce, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Rev. Liston H. Pearce the sum of $540, in full for his services as chaplain of the one hundred and thirty-second regiment of Illinois volunteers during the recent rebellion.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. WHEELER.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the bill (H. R. No. 695) for the relief of William H. Wheeler, of Bangor, Maine, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The preamble recites that William H. Wheeler, of Bangor, Maine, in the month of February, 1865, lost a United States bond of the denomination of $500, issued under the act of 25th February, 1862, No. 18,374, with all the unpaid coupons attached, which bond has since been found mutilated and partially destroyed; and that thirteen of the coupons have been reclaimed in such condition as to be paid at maturity; and it is uncertain whether the remaining coupons are not still in existence; and the bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and deliver to William H. Wheeler a duplicate of the bond, No. 18,374, without coupons attached; but before issuing it Wheeler is to deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury all the remaining fragments and parts of the bond, excepting the thirteen coupons which have been reclaimed as aforesaid.

The Committee on Claims reported an amendment, to add to the bill the following words:

With a good and sufficient bond with security, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to indemnify the United States against all loss, costs, or damages incurred by reason of the issuing of said duplicate bond.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

JOHN WELLS AND SONS.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) for the relief of John Wells & Sons, of Baltimore, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Quartermaster General, with the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, to remit to John Wells & Sons, of Baltimore, Maryland, so much of the penalty incurred by them by reason of their failure to comply with their contract entered into on the 4th day of October, 1863, with Captain S. H. Dunau, assistant quartermaster, under the direction of the Quartermaster General, for repairing the steamer City of Albany, as may not be covered by the actual loss of the Government by reason of the delay in completing the steamer in accordance with the strict terms of the contract.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISAAC RANNEY.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 119) for the relief of Isaac Ranney, internal revenue collector for the eighth district of Ohio, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that on the night of the 25th of June, 1865, the office of Thomas J. Robinson, deputy collector of Isaac Ramsey, internal revenue collector for the eighth district, Ohio, located at Mansfield, was burglariously entered by persons whose names are unknown; and that the burglars did, by means of drills and gunpowder, break into and enter the iron safe of the deputy collector, and feloniously steal and carry away revenue stamps therefrom belonging to the Government of the United States to the amount of $632 23; and that this burglarious entry and larceny was not attributable to any neglect of duty on the part of Robinson as deputy collector, and that the office and safe were in all respects such as were required by the law and the regulations of the revenue department. The bill therefore proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury in the settlement of the accounts of Isaac Ramsey, as internal revenue collector, with the Government of the United States, to allow and give credit to him for the amount of the stamps stolen.

The Committee on Claims reported an amendment, to strike out the name "Ramsey" where ever it occurs in the resolution and to insert "Ranney."

Mr. CLARK. Ranney is the proper name, and the correction should be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made without putting the question, it being the correction of a clerical mistake.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the joint resolution read a third time. The resolution was read the third time and passed. Its title was amended by striking out "Ramsey" and inserting "Ranney."

CAROLINE A. RANDALL.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 170) for the relief of Caroline A. Randall, administratrix and widow of Charles B. Randall, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is a direction to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to pay to the legal representatives of Charles B. Randall, deceased, late lieutenant colonel of the one hundred and forty-ninth regiment New York volunteer infantry, who was killed in action on the 20th of July, 1864, at the battle of Beech-Tree Creek, Georgia, the sum of $175, as payment for one private horse used by Randall in the military service, which horse was lost by starvation five days after his death.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HORACE I. HODGES.

Mr. CLARK. I desire unanimous consent to report back and put upon its passage at this time House bill No. 526. I think there is no dispute about it. The Committee on Claims unanimously directed me to report it.

The bill (H. R. No. 526) for the relief of the heirs of Horace I. Hodges was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in the settlement of the accounts with the Treasury of Horace I. Hodges, deceased, late captain and assistant quartermaster United States volunteers, there shall be allowed in his favor the sum of $1,256 40 on account of the loss of that amount of public funds in his hands by the capture of Plymouth, North Carolina, by the rebels on the 20th day of April, 1864, the loss being without neglect or fault on his part, and he having lost his life at that time in attempting to carry orders from the commanding officer at Plymouth to the United States gunboats.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM G. LEE.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the bill (H. R. No. 629) for the benefit of William G. Lee, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay William G. Lee, or his legal representatives, the sum of $28,428 50, in full payment of his claim against the United States on account of corn purchased by him in the department of Kentucky, as the agent of the quartermaster's department under the agreement made by him with Captain John A. Morris, in 1864, and which corn spoiled on his hands by reason of the Government failing to furnish transportation for it.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILTON M'KINNON.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 111) for the relief of Milton McKinnon was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Committee on Claims reported an amendment as a substitute for the bill in these words:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Sergeant Milton McKinnon the sum of $58 45, being the amount of a draft drawn in his favor by Major M. L. Martin, late paymaster United States Army, on the Assistant Treasurer of the United States in New York, dated March 24, 1864, and which was lost in its transmission to New York: Provided, That the said Milton McKinnon shall file a duplicate of said draft, duly authenticated, with the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided also, That the payment herein authorized shall not be made until said McKinnon shall execute to the United States a bond, with good and sufficient security, to indemnify the United States against loss on account of said draft.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in. The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time and passed.

SUE MURPHEY.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the bill (S. No. 413) for the relief of Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be paid to Miss Sue Murphey, of Decatur, Alabama, $7,000, in full compensation for damages done her farm in Decatur, Alabama, by reason of the same being occupied for military purposes, and for the destruction of the buildings and other property thereon.

Mr. WILSON. I do not like the reading of that bill. I wish to hear an explanation of it.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to hear the bill read again. I do not know what it is for. Is it for damages because our troops encamped on somebody's farm?

Mr. CLARK. Not at all. This lady lives at Decatur, Alabama. Her farm was occupied by our troops, and it became necessary to fortify the place. Her house was upon her farm, situated exactly in the corner of the fortification that it was necessary to erect. She is proved to have been an eminently loyal person by all those who had acquaintance with her. The Government destroyed her house entirely, took it down, and built a fortification right upon it; it became absolutely necessary to do so for the defense of the place.

Mr. POMEROY. I think this must be a case about like the Armes case.

Mr. CLARK. It involves the same principle as the Armes case; but here the house was taken down and a fortification put upon the spot.

Mr. POMEROY. Have we passed the Armes bill?

Mr. CLARK. We passed it once, but it stands on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This was taken by order of the commanding officer directly.

Mr. CLARK. There is no question of it.

Mr. POMEROY. I will not oppose this, because I am in favor of the Armes bill.

Mr. CLARK. It is a claim that ought to be paid.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time and passed.

AMELIA FEASTER.

Mr. CLARK. I move next to take up Senate bill No. 434.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 434) for the relief of Mrs. Amelia Feaster, of Columbia, South Carolina, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Mrs. Feaster of $10,000 as reimbursement for money expended by her in alleviating the sufferings of officers and soldiers of the United States Army confined in rebel prisons in South Carolina during the late rebellion.

Mr. CLARK. I ask that the report may be read in that case.

Mr. RAMSEY and Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no; there is no objection to the bill.

Mr. CLARK. If there is no objection to the bill, and nobody desires to listen to the report, it need not be read.

Mr. JOHNSON. The only objection I have is that the amount is not half enough.

Mr. CLARK. It is all we thought we could give her.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON CROSLAND.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the bill (S. No. 431) for the relief of Washington Crosland was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Washington Crosland, of St. Louis, Missouri, the sum of $20,000, in satisfaction of all damages which accrued to him by reason of the construction of a railroad across his two lots of land in the city of St. Louis by the United States for military purposes.

Mr. CLARK. The bill is printed wrongly. The amount agreed upon by the committee was $2,000. I move to strike out "twenty" and insert "two." I am told this is a mistake of the printer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BARK MARIA HENRY.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the bill (H. R. No. 518) for the relief of the owners of the bark Maria Henry was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $12,000 to George Hearn, agent and part owner of the bark Maria Henry, of Portland, Maine, in full compensation for the use and detention of that vessel by the military authorities of the United States, from the 26th day of February to the 26th day of May, 1865, inclusive.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. I think the language of the bill does not cover the claim.

Mr. CLARK. I think the bill should be amended, and I move to amend it by adding the words, "and for any and all damages for the omission of said Government to load said vessel with coal for New Orleans or Port Royal."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

ALEXANDER F. PRATT.

On motion of Mr. HOWE the bill (S. No. 435) for the relief of Alexander F. Pratt was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $530 to Alexander F. Pratt, in full for pursuing and capturing one Elijah K. Janner, convicted of counterfeiting United States coin.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN HASTINGS.

Mr. CLARK. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to report back from the Committee on Claims, and put on its passage at this time, a bill for the relief of John Hastings, late surveyor and depository of the public moneys at Pittsburg. He was not collector of customs, but he was depository of the public money. The Department refused to pay him on that account. This bill simply amends that bill in that particular, and appropriates to him the same amount in lieu of that.

The bill (S. No. 324) for the relief of John Hastings, late surveyor and depository of public moneys at Pittsburg was considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

E. J. CURLEY.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the bill (S. No. 433) for the relief of E. J. Curley was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to require the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, or cause to be paid, E. J. Curley the sum of $34,248 52 as compensation in full for corn purchased of him by Captain E. B. W. Reslieux, assistant quartermaster, on the part of the Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JANES, FOWLER, KIRTLAND AND COMPANY.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, the bill (S. No. 429) for the relief of Janes, Fowler, Kirtland & Co. was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $62,524 66 for reimbursement of money expended in the construction of the dome of the Capitol.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is a pretty large sum. I think we ought to know what the facts are.

Mr. CLARK. There is a report in the case. The Secretary read the following report, made by Mr. CLARK on the 16th instant:

The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the petition and papers relative to the claim of Janes, Fowler, Kirtland, & Co., asking compensation for damages resulting from the suspension by the Government of the work on the dome of the Capitol, from May, 1861, to May, 1862, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report:

The petitioners set forth that on the 15th day of February, 1860, they entered into a contract with the United States, through William B. Franklin, captain of topographical engineers, in charge of Capitol extension, for the construction of all that part of the new dome above the first section, at seven cents per pound; payments to be made monthly, after the commencement of the work, as follows: four and one-half cents per pound on the delivery and acceptance of material on the ground, and the remaining two and a half cents on the erection and acceptance of such material. Fifteen per cent to be reserved until the whole work should be completed and accepted. The contract is contained in the correspondence published in Senate Documents, Thirty-Sixth Congress, first session, Miscellaneous Document No. 29, pages 39 to 52 inclusive, to which they respectfully refer for further information.

The memorialists proceeded with all possible dispatch and diligence in the execution of their contract, and by the 17th of May, 1861, had placed in the structure 2,409,823 pounds of iron, and had on the ground 567,199 pounds ready for erection—leaving to be manufactured less than one third in weight of material.

At that date, to wit, 17th of May, 1861, the Secretary of War, against the earnest remonstrances of the memorialists, ordered that the work be suspended, "or, if carried on, it be done at the risk and expense of the contractor, to be paid for only when the condition of the Treasury shall justify the Government in applying its resources to works of art, not of absolute necessity."

In the settlement which followed this order there was withheld from the memorialists fifteen per cent. on the work already done, and other amounts, making a total of over $40,000. By reason of this order of suspension and the withholding of so large an amount of money already earned, they were compelled to stop both the purchase and manufacture of material, dismiss large numbers of skilled laborers, and let their workshops and machinery (which had been greatly enlarged to enable them to execute this contract with dispatch) lie idle. The firm thereby became embarrassed and lost about thirty thousand dollars of their capital in the year 1861.

By the act of 19th of April, 1862, the construction of the dome was directed to be resumed under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior; and in May, 1862, the memorialists were requested to resume work. The price of material and labor had been advanced considerably and was steadily rising, and it was evident that they could not complete the work at the contract price without considerable loss. They knew the contract was forfeited by the wrongful act of the Government, and that they were under no obligation, legal or moral, to proceed with it. But the Government still held $30,000 of money due before the suspension, which they feared would never be paid if they refused to go on. They knew, too, that no other contractors could complete the unfinished dome as promptly, perfectly, and economically as they. And above all other motives influencing them was a pride in completing the splendid work they had begun. They therefore determined to resume work under this broken contract, or without a contract as the transaction might be viewed, trusting to Congress to make good whatever might be lost by reason of the year's suspension.

But they found the task greatly more difficult and expensive than before, by reason of the scarcity of skilled labor and rapid advance of materials; while they could readily, with the force on hand when the work was suspended in 1861, have completed all the castings and delivered them on the ground within that year. Their skilled workmen once dismissed and scattered, it was impossible with the most energetic effort to get a full force of such workmen to cast and manufacture material—so that in 1862 they were able to manufacture and ship to Washington only 653,195 pounds, which was less than half of the work which remained to be done at the date of the suspension. In 1863, the difficulties of procuring such skilled labor had greatly increased, so that they were only able to manufacture and ship 589,743 pounds; in 1864, 190,649 pounds—leaving 51,287 pounds necessary to complete the work, which were manufactured and shipped in 1865.

This protraction through three years of work which could have been completed in one had the contract been unsuspended, added greatly to its cost, partly because it occupied the time and attention of the firm withdrawn by it from a profitable custom business, but chiefly because of the rapid increase in cost of material, freight, and labor.

All other material, labor, and service increased each year in about the same average ratio with the increase of materials and labor as above given.

Though more than a third of the casting was done in 1862, when labor and material were greatly lower than in the years following, yet five sixths of the work of erection was done after that year. The most of the casting done in 1862 was comparatively plain work, while nearly all the costly ornamental casting was done in subsequent years, when labor was at or near its maximum rates, so that at least three fourths of the expenditures after the suspension were neces-early made by affiants when prices, through the inflation of the currency and the scarcity of labor, were at or about the maximum rates above given.

Affiants are unable to state in detail and with precision the increased cost of the various kinds and amounts of material and labor beyond what such cost would have been had the work not been suspended. But they are confident the following is not an exaggerated statement of such increased cost:

1,393,704 lbs. pig iron, (2,240 lbs. pig iron produced but 2,000 lbs. castings), @ 4 cent $\frac{1}{2}$ lb.	\$6,968 52
200,000 lbs. wrought iron, @ 5 cents $\frac{1}{2}$ lb.	10,000 00
475 tons coal, including freight from Elizabethtown to foundry, for melting power, &c., @ \$4 50 $\frac{1}{2}$ ton.	2,137 50
Molding and shop expenses on 1,393,704 lbs. pig iron, @ 1 cent $\frac{1}{2}$ lb.	20,905 56
Fitting, drilling, &c.—16,000 days' work, @ 25 $\frac{1}{2}$ day.	20,000 00
Putting up—8,000 days' work, @ \$1 50 $\frac{1}{2}$ day.	12,000 00

Total increased cost to contractors.....$95,136 58

The memorialists further represent that, inasmuch as the suspension occurred through no fault of theirs and against their remonstrances, they are legally and equitably entitled to pay for all done after the suspension, at the fair value of the work. Messrs. George R. Jackson and J. B. Cornell, who are as competent and reliable experts on the question as any gentlemen in the country, have given their estimates in the affidavits above referred to. Mr. Jackson says fifteen cents a pound would be less than a fair price for the work done after the suspension, and Mr. Cornell says that twenty cents would be no more than a fair price. The memorialists therefore ask that Congress pay them, in addition to the seven cents per pound which they have already received, eight cents per pound on the 1,431,384 pounds manufactured and erected after the work was resumed—$118,550 72.

The memorialists originally took the contract at a price which they were well aware left no room for profit. But for the suspension they could, however, have executed it without considerable loss. In now asking the amount named above, they seek not more than the law would probably give them as damages, nor more than will repair their losses actually incurred by the breach of the contract. They claim no profit from their labor, more than the honor of having their names associated with a work which in design and execution has no equal in the ornamental architecture of the world.

The committee find the foregoing statements of the memorialists substantially true.

That they did contract for the work on the dome of the Capitol, as they have stated. They also find that the work on the dome was arbitrarily interrupted by the Secretary of War, and that they were put to much damage and loss, and incurred great expense in afterward carrying forward the work, till they finally brought it to its present beauty and perfection, a structure scarcely, if anywhere, equaled in the world. In doing this the memorialists by the action of the Government were put at too much increased expense as before stated; materials and labor each cost more when the work was resumed than they did when it was interrupted.

This fact is made known to the committee not alone by proofs in this case, but by their general knowledge of prices.

The committee, however, have not adopted the basis of damages as stated by the memorialists, but have endeavored to make a more exact calculation of the work put up each year, and the price which should be paid for it.

The work was interrupted in May, 1861, and recommenced in May, 1862.

In the year 1862 the memorialists put in place 653,195 pounds of iron; on this they should be paid three cents per pound additional, making $19,595 85.

In 1863 they put up 586,743 pounds, and for this they should have four cents per pound additional, making $23,489 72.

In 1864 they put up 190,840 pounds of iron, and on this they should be paid seven cents per pound additional, making $15,346 05.

In 1865 they put up 51,287 pounds of iron, and for this they should be paid eight cents per pound additional, making $4,002 96; amounting in all to the sum of $60,521 65.

In accordance with the above the committee report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. HOWE. I feel bound to say to the Senate that I am not satisfied with this report or with the bill. The Senate doubtless understand from the reading of the report that these gentlemen claim damages which they say they sustained by reason of the violation of a contract made by them with the Government of the United States for the completion of the dome of this building. I think the bill ought not to pass for two reasons: first, I think that the proof is very defective upon which the committee have alleged that there was a violation of the contract; and secondly, if there was a violation of the contract, I think the report overestimates the damage sustained in consequence of it.

The existence of the contract is undisputed. The claimants allege that by direction of the Secretary of War they were ordered to suspend work on the Capitol dome in the spring of 1861. I believe there is no proof of that except the allegation in the petition itself.

Mr. CLARK. There is the order. There is no question about it.

Mr. HOWE. The order is simply this, as near as I remember it: they are directed not to prosecute the work unless they will do so, content to take their pay when the Government can pay them, or when the Government has money to expend upon works of art. It is very manifest that, let them do the work when they would, or let any contractor do the work when he would, he can only get his pay when the Government has the money to pay him. Every man does work for the Government on that condition; and every man does work for everybody else on that condition. He cannot get his pay until the debtor has the money to pay him. I do not think the Secretary of War had any authority to interfere with this contract. I do not think he ought to have interfered with the execution of it. I do not think he did interfere except in that way. I think, in spite of all the Secretary of War said, the contractors were still at liberty to go on and complete the work, and their obligation would have been just as good upon the Government as if the Secretary of War had said nothing.

But, supposing that to be a violation of the contract, the Senate ought to consider what was the state of the contract at that time. Something more than half the work had been done, and that the cheapest part of the work, because it was the lowest part of the dome. The contract, then, was violated when half of the work, and that the cheapest part, was done. What was the damage to the contractor? He got paid for doing the cheapest work at the same rate which the contract provided for paying for the whole. Clearly, then, there was no damage if he had stopped then, if he had not prosecuted the work any further. But it seems a year subsequent to that he was requested to go on and complete the contract, and he concluded to go on under the contract. I cannot help regarding that as a new bargain to complete the contract on the terms stipulated in the original bargain.

There is no doubt that prices had enhanced in the market. It was more expensive to get labor and get materials in 1862 than it was in 1861. And considering the fact that the Secretary did make this request to suspend work in 1861, I should not think it hard to ask the Government to pay what the work actually cost in 1862 more than it cost in 1861; but it was clearly in the power of the contractors to finish the work in 1862, and I think the most they can claim is the difference between the cost of labor and materials in 1862 and the cost of labor and materials in 1861. Instead of that the report gives them the additional price in 1862 for what work was done in 1862, the additional cost of work and labor in 1863 for what was done in that year, and a still higher price for what was done in 1864, leaving them to run the job through three years when prices were constantly going up; whereas the petition itself states that they could have completed it in one year, that they could have completed it in the year 1861. If they could have completed it in 1861, I think they could have completed it in 1862, and if we are to make them compensation for the advance in prices between those two years it is all we ought to do. I do not think the Senate is much interested in it, and therefore I will not spend any further time upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the chairman whether there is evidence that the work could have been completed in one year.

Mr. CLARK. I think it was very satisfactorily shown that if they had not been interrupted they could have gone on and completed it within a year.

Mr. JOHNSON. When they went to work again, why did they not go on and complete it within a year?

Mr. CLARK. Because it was impossible to get their men back to the foundry and do the same work they had been doing before.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Did it take three years to get them back?

Mr. CLARK. It took three years to get the work through, as they were going on.

Mr. HOWE. What is the evidence that they could not get the men back in 1862?

Mr. CLARK. I think it is to be found in a variety of documents the committee had before them. I have not got them here now, because I separated them out from the papers that I wanted to go on the files; but I have examined this case with great care. For a year or two the attention of the late Senator from Vermont (Mr. Foot) was called to it when he was upon the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and he became very well satisfied that the Government owed these parties a large amount of money. The same claim was before the Committee on Claims in the last Congress, and was under the attention of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] who came to the same conclusion, but did not arrive at the exact amount that ought to be paid.

At this session of Congress it came before the Committee on Claims again, and I have devoted to it a good deal of time, such time as I could command during the business of the Senate, and have made a very careful analysis of the claim. We have not awarded them anything by way of damage, simply upon the claim itself. There is no doubt in the world that they had this contract to do this work at a given rate, and that they were going on successfully, were engaged in doing the work when the war broke out. There was no provision that the Government should have any right to stop their contract; but when the war broke out the Secretary of War by an arbitrary order stopped the work unless these parties would go on and do it at their own risk and pay their own men. They having at that time a considerable quantity of cast iron laying under the derrick, which would become rusted and broken to a certain extent and spoiled, went on and put that work up at their own expense, and it was a year after that time before the Government would settle. Notwithstanding the Secretary of War arbitrarily broke the contract in that way, when the quartermaster came to settle, though the parties were entitled to their money, he would not pay them so much by a cent per pound, keeping back not only the fifteen per cent. which he had for security that they would go on with the contract, but he kept back a cent a pound for all the work done by these parties and allowed no interest. And it was not till about the time we were getting a bill through to put the work into the hands of the Secretary of the Interior and ordering it to go on that the quartermaster would settle with these parties for work that was done long before.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Who was the quartermaster?

Mr. CLARK. Meigs, the Quartermaster General.

Mr. TRUMBULL. He made the contract, did he not?

Mr. CLARK. No. Franklin made the contract, and the evidence, all the way through, shows how these parties were used by the quartermaster; I now mean Franklin. These parties contracted to put this iron in place. They cast their iron in New York according to the pattern, and when it was brought here it had to have some chipping and filing done in order to fix it to the places; and the quartermaster—I mean Franklin now—required them to sweep up the chippings and the filings, and he weighed them back to those men and charged them for them. Then when they came to interrupt the contract for a year they kept back all that was due these parties as security, that some time or other they should undertake to go on again. In determining what these men should have, we can ascertain exactly what they paid in the year 1862 after they resumed the contract, and the committee have allowed them three cents a pound additional for putting that up. They could have got their iron in Baltimore at the time they were interrupted for seventeen dollars a ton for pig iron, and they had to pay afterward as high as fifty or sixty dollars a ton. They not only showed us the estimate but brought us the bill of the parties whom they paid for the iron, showing exactly what they did pay themselves. It was not an estimate of the price of iron, but was exactly what they had to pay. For iron which they could have had at from seventeen to twenty dollars a ton they had to pay from thirty-five to fifty dollars; and they had sometimes to pay for freight as high as seven dollars a ton. You know, Mr. President, that freights were very high. When they undertook the work they could bring castings by water, but afterward the Potomac was blockaded and they could not bring it in that way. They were obliged to bring it over the railroad and get it along as best they could. Coal became very high.

So much were they pressed by the stoppage of this work that they had to sell their real estate in New York at a loss in order to meet their payments and carry forward this work which they were undertaking for the Government; and at the very time that they had to sell their real estate to meet their payments Government was keeping back from thirty to forty thousand dollars of their money without any sort of propriety.

It is a case that appeals to the justice of the Government. They think they should have a larger sum; they think they should have ninety-odd thousand dollars. The committee did not think so, but they figured it down to the lowest sum, and by pounds and ounces have awarded them sixty-two thousand odd dollars. I think the bill should pass.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I concurred in this report, and I am satisfied of its correctness; and if there be any objection to it, it consists in not allowing these men as much as they are entitled to recover, and in my judgment could recover, in a court of law in case this contract existed between these petitioners and another person. They entered into a contract with the Government of the United States to do a certain quantity of work at a certain price. After they had entered upon that work and made their preparations, hired their skilled workmen, and procured their materials for the completion of the work, the Government interposed and arbitrarily discharged them, refused to allow the men to proceed and perform the contract.

Mr. JOHNSON. Permit me to ask whether there was any provision in the contract that the Government should be at liberty to terminate the contract at any time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. None whatever.

Mr. CLARK. Not the least. There was no allusion to any such thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The petitioners were compelled at that time to abandon their contract, at a time when labor was cheap and materials were comparatively cheap. Then a period of about a year intervened. After the expiration of that year they were requested to resume the work upon this contract and they proceeded pursuant to that request to complete the job of work. Now, I say that they would be entitled in a court of law to recover upon a quantum meruit, that the violation of the contract on the part of the Government discharged them from its obligations, and when the Government requested them to resume this work, and they did pursuant to that request resume the work, they would be entitled to recover what that work was reasonably worth.

Mr. JOHNSON. Unless they agreed to go on under the contract, they would certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no evidence here that they did agree to go on under the contract.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Would not that be the legal effect of it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not necessarily.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it would.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Government retained $30,000 of money that belonged to these persons. There was no reason for them to expect that the Government would pay to them this $30,000 unless they did go on and finish the contract.

Mr. HOWE. I want to know if the Government did not owe them the $30,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know what view the Government took; but the $30,000 was reserved to compel these men to complete the contract, and they were not entitled, according to the view which the Government took of the contract, to receive the $30,000 until the contract was completed, until the dome was erected and finished.

Mr. HOWE. Has the Government been heard? When the Senator talks about "the Government," I suppose he means the Quartermaster General.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is "the Government" for this purpose.

Mr. HOWE. Has that embodiment of the Government been heard from on this subject?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I judge according to the evidence that was submitted to the committee in this case; and I would inquire of the Senate for what purpose this $30,000 was retained by the Government if it was not to compel these men to resume this contract and complete the job. It is manifest if the Government had any object in retaining this $30,000, after that amount had been earned by these men, it was to enforce them to a performance of the contract. That could have been the only object in retaining this amount of money.

Mr. HOWE. I will simply say that if the Quartermaster General or Secretary of War refused to pay the $30,000—what the evidence is on that point I do not recollect, Senators can tell—his refusal did not bind the Government. It was just as easy for the contractors to apply to Congress to pay them the $30,000 as it is for them now to apply to Congress to pay them $95,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that these men understood or had any reason to suppose that Congress would pay to them the $30,000 which was retained by the Quartermaster General or in the hands of the Government.

Mr. HOWE. I think contractors in common with all other citizens of the United States do act upon the theory that Congress will pay what the Government owes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know what view would have been taken of that claim when presented to Congress. It might have been answered that these men had earned this money; that it was in the hands of the Quartermaster General, if he was the proper officer to hold it; and Congress might have referred them to that officer and required them to demand and obtain the money from him, if they could.

But, sir, I do not consider that that objection is at all material. The fact is that the Government violated this contract. The Government threw these men out of employment for one year. They were compelled to discharge their skilled workmen; they were compelled to abandon all the preparations and arrangements which they had made for the procurement of material; and then, after labor had risen to two or three times what it cost in 1861, and after materials had risen two or three times higher than they would cost in 1861, these men, at the request of the Government, and under this sort of compulsion which the Government imposed upon them by withholding $30,000, resumed this labor and completed the job; and now they simply ask that the Government shall pay them what that labor was reasonably worth, because they say if the Government had not wantonly and arbitrarily interposed and prevented them from performing this contract they would have performed it according to the letter of the contract in 1861, and would have been contented with the payment provided for in the contract.

Now, sir, it would be manifest injustice for the Government to compel these men to do this labor when labor cost two or three times as much and materials cost two or three times as much as they did when they had the contract and could have performed it. Manifest injustice, I say, will be done if the Government shall now say to these men, "You shall have no more for the work than the original contract price." The committee have not allowed these men as much as they would be entitled to estimating the prices as they ranged at that time; but they made an estimate giving them a part, and not a very large proportion, as I think, of the additional expense that was imposed upon them by the violation of this contract on the part of the Government; and if these parties were to go into a court of law, if that were practicable, and sue the Government, I can see no reason why they would not be entitled to recover what their labor and materials were reasonably worth when the work was done under this request on the part of the Government.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not propose this warm evening to argue this case with the members of the committee who have reported it, nor am I sufficiently familiar with the facts to do so; but I was not satisfied from the reading of the report that the measure of damages adopted by the committee was a proper one. This case is argued by the Senator from Oregon as if the parties engaged in the manufacture of iron for the dome of this building were engaged in no other business. He says they discharged their hands and could not get them back again. Now, I suppose if the fact was inquired into it would be found that they were large manufacturers and probably had just as many hands—

Mr. CLARK. Allow me to state to the Senator exactly how that was. The only other business they had was a separate business of making ranges for dwelling-houses, nothing at all compared with this, and when this was stopped they were obliged to shut up the shop that they had for this and discharge all the hands connected with this work.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I know that the iron manufacturers were very prosperous during the war.

Mr. CLARK. These men did make something on their ranges.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should suppose they were no exception to the general rule. But I do not propose to argue the case here. I would ask Senators who are present, if I can get their attention for a moment, for what purpose we have established the Court of Claims. Can anybody tell me what we have established the Court of Claims for if it is not to try just such cases as this? I have always insisted that the worst possible body to adjudicate upon claims was a committee of Congress. Now, I have very great confidence in the Senator from New Hampshire and in the Senator from Oregon and in their opinions when they have investigated a case; but why they should have spent time in investigating this case and bringing it here, I cannot conceive. Here is a case growing out of a contract between Government and certain parties directly within the terms of the law, giving these parties the right to go into the Court of Claims to enforce their claim if they have one. Why did they not go there? The only reason why they do not go there must be because they think they will do better trusting Congress.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say to the Senator that the House and Senate have not always been able to agree in regard to the cases that should go to the Court of Claims. After the bill was passed amending the Court of Claims act and giving them certain jurisdiction, the Senate committee undertook to be pretty strict in regard to it, but the House would send their reports and their matters still to the Committee of Claims for examination. In the Congress before the last this bill was sent by the Senate to the Committee on Public Buildings for examination, instead of to the Court of Claims. At the last Congress it was sent to the Committee on Claims for examination, but was not examined. At this session it was sent again by the Senate to the Committee on Claims to be examined. Three times it has been sent by the Senate to committees of this body for examination; and the committee did not feel, when it had been sent in that way, after the parties had made their preparation under the direction of the Senate in that way, that they should be turned over to the Court of Claims.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In reply to that I will appeal to Senators as to what the practice of this body is. When the petition comes here from some claimant it is presented in the morning hour, and nobody pays any attention to it, and it is sent without a vote or without a word either at the suggestion of the President to the appropriate committee or a motion is made that it go to the committee. It is no passing upon the matter by the Senate; and if the Court of Claims is for any purpose it is to hear just such a case as this. The Senator from Oregon tells us that the Government violated its contract; that it is under legal obligation to pay these parties. Let them go to the court. These parties understood very well that the Court of Claims had jurisdiction of this case. Why not go there, where attorneys are employed upon both sides, where the testimony is not ex parte, where every fact is submitted to a judicial test by cross-examination, and where adverse witnesses are called? They did not want to go there.

Now, sir, I move that this case be referred to the Court of Claims. I am not disposed to argue it, but I hope the Senate will send it to the Court of Claims at once. If these parties are entitled to more than $60,000, let the Court of Claims give them more, and I shall be satisfied. While we have a Court of Claims for the investigation of just such cases, I insist upon it that the precedent is bad to undertake to act upon them in Congress. I presume every Senator, like myself, will admit that the vote he gives upon this claim is given entirely upon trust, not from any personal examination of his own. I have listened to this report, and I am not at all satisfied with the principle adopted as a rule of damages. I do not think it would do in a court of law to adopt such a rule. What is it? These parties are allowed by this report the difference between the price of iron in 1864 and its price in 1861. These contractors were only stopped one year; and are they, by running their contracts along for three years, to be allowed the enhanced price of iron the third year, when, according to their own showing, they could have furnished the whole of it, and ought to have furnished the whole of it in one year, and that under the pretense that they could not get hands? We know, as a general fact, that iron manufacturers made extravagant profits during the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and found hands. They could afford to pay high prices, because they made extravagant profits. I submit the motion that this claim be referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. CLARK. I am not going to argue the question whether it should go to the Court of Claims or not. After the Senate have submitted it to the committee and the committee have bestowed their time upon it and investigated it to the best of their ability, if the Senate are not satisfied and desire to have it go to the Court of Claims I shall submit, though I think we have done the matter justice. But I want to state that after this work was interrupted in 1861, while the Government held over thirty thousand dollars of these parties' money, the Government—I speak now of Congress—by virtue of the act of April 19, 1862, directed the work to be resumed under the Secretary of the Interior. Before it was resumed they took it out from the hands of the War Department, put it into the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, and directed it to be resumed, and at the very time they directed it to be resumed they held over thirty thousand dollars of these people's money. If that be justice and they are to have no damages, I cannot quite understand the rule of damages.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Illinois moves that this bill be referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HOWE. I think that direction had better be given to this claim. It will be seen at once that we propose to vote sixty-odd thousand dollars out of the Treasury. If rightfully due to these parties, it is the fault of certain high officers of the Government. I think they ought to be heard. If not heard here or in the Court of Claims they ought to be sworn somewhere. I do not know that the committee have received from them any explanation of the conduct which is alleged to have given these contractors a right to recover of us over sixty thousand dollars. Certainly, it seems to me, they ought to be heard upon that point. I believe, though I am not prepared to speak so confidently upon that point as the Senator from New Hampshire is, because I have not examined the case as closely as he has, this report is mainly but a recitation of what is said in the petition of the contractors. I do not know of any evidence going to show even that the contractors discharged a man in 1861. I can conceive it very probable that they did discharge a good many; but I do not know of a particle of testimony in the case going to show that they could not have completed this whole work in 1862 just as well as in 1861.

Mr. CLARK. I will inquire of the Senator if he has examined the testimony.

Mr. HOWE. Not very closely.

Mr. CLARK. I supposed so.

Mr. HOWE. I asked the Senator to refer me to the evidence, but he has not done it.

Mr. CLARK. Because I have not all the papers here.

Mr. HOWE. I asked for it in committee, and did not get it. The Senator said that at the last session these papers were in the hands of another member of the committee. My impression is that at the last session they were in my hands; I gave it some examination, not enough to be able even to report to the committee upon it; but I do not know of any evidence in the case which ought to satisfy us that this work could not have been done in 1862 just as well as in sixty years. On the contrary, I think there are strong reasons for concluding that these very contractors did a great deal more than the amount of work that would have been required of them to complete this contract. They were carrying on other branches of business which paid large profits. The profits of that kind of manufacturing were constantly going on, and I can conceive, if they were smart business men, as I believe they are, they were ambitious of extending that branch of their work instead of this branch, the price for which was limited, and limited by a contract made before high prices commenced. In this state of the proof I do submit that this case had better go to the Court of Claims, where parties can be heard by sworn witnesses as well as by the arguments of counsel.

Mr. CLARK. I find I have the proof here, and sworn witnesses as well.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Cross-examined or mere affidavits?

Mr. CLARK. Not cross-examined. Here is a great variety of statements proving all the facts set out very clearly.

Mr. POMEROY. I submit to the Senator, as the Senate is very thin, whether the bill had not better be laid aside and let us take a vote on it to-morrow. If we have a division, it is manifest to me that we shall have to adjourn.

Mr. CLARK. If anybody is disposed to make any objection because there is not a quorum here, I will move to adjourn, and that will carry the bill over and make it the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. POMEROY. Are there not some other bills to be acted upon?

Mr. CLARK. We have nothing else but the Ames case.

Mr. POMEROY. I want to reach that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. So far as I am concerned, I shall be satisfied with an expression of the Senators present. If it is manifest that they are not disposed to refer it, I am willing to let it be acted upon. I shall not call for a division.

Mr. CLARK. Let us take a vote, then.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If Senators will vote, the Chair can decide what the disposition of the Senators present is, whether to refer it or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to refer this bill to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think the Court of Claims is any more competent to examine this case than the committee that has examined it. The labor has been gone through with, and I am not in favor of its reference. It is not entirely clear that it comes within the law.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Witnesses have not been cross-examined here. The case is on ex parte affidavits entirely.

Mr. HOWE. What is that testimony, I should like to know.

Mr. CLARK. The testimony of the three several partners individually as to those facts, and then a great variety of other witnesses who swear to it.

Mr. HOWE. Swear to what?

Mr. CLARK. To the great variety of facts that go to make up the case. I think there are as many as eight or nine affidavits here. I think the facts stated in the report are fully proved.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator says he finds on his table the affidavits of the three claimants and eight or nine other affidavits. I do not know but that ought to persuade the Senate that the Government owes $62,000!

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to these matters of claims, there is one rule that has always governed me in voting on motions to refer to the Court of Claims. The simple question with me always has been whether it is a case of which they have jurisdiction. If they have, I always vote to refer, because I think the court has better opportunities of examining claims than committees can well have, by the cross-examination of witnesses. It is only those cases of private claims of which the court have no jurisdiction that I am willing to act upon here.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator must be aware that if we refer it to the Court of Claims that gives them jurisdiction whether they have it under the law now or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Court of Claims.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSIAH O. ARMES.

Mr. CLARK. I now move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 16) for the relief of Josiah O. Ames. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts, if he is here, to withdraw his motion for reconsideration, and let the bill go to the other House.

Mr. RAMSEY. Let us reconsider it.

Mr. CLARK. No, I do not want to reconsider it. The bill was passed and sent over to the House and then brought back for a motion to reconsider. I only want to get rid of the motion to reconsider.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY.) The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 17, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the reading of the Journal of yesterday be dispensed with. The motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD TO PACIFIC OCEAN.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Pacific Railroad be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 20) entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific ocean." I desire that it may go to the Speaker's table.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. JULIAN. I move that the bill (S. No. 257) entitled "An act to regulate the occupation of mineral lands, and to extend the right of preemption thereto," be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be printed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST.

Mr. McCLURG. I desire to announce to the House that the contested-election case of Koontz vs. Coffroth will be called up as soon as the privileged question now pending shall be disposed of, or as soon thereafter as possible. I trust that members will endeavor to read the report before the case comes up.

ASSAULT UPON A MEMBER.

Mr. SPALDING. I give notice that I shall demand a final vote on the question of privilege in relation to the assault on a member at three o'clock.

RATIONS OF UNION PRISONERS.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution in regard to rations of Union soldiers held as prisoners of war.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas by general order of the War Department of February 14, 1862, rations to Union soldiers held as prisoners of war in the rebel States were commuted at a cost price during the period of imprisonment; and whereas a large number of the said prisoners have been paid under said order, but many equally worthy with them and who have suffered in rebel prisons have not been so paid: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That all Union soldiers who were held as prisoners of war in the rebel States, and who have not received any commutation of rations at a cost price during the period of their imprisonment: Provided, That no person who has sold or transferred any interest in the claim for commutation shall be benefited by this resolution; and no purchaser or assignee of such claim or interest shall be benefited by this resolution, and that such commutation be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask permission to move that on and after to-morrow the House meet at eleven o'clock. We have either got to have evening sessions or meet earlier in the day.

Mr. STEVENS objected.

LAND TITLES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BIDWELL, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill to quiet land titles in California, submitted the following report, and demanded the previous question thereon:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 343) "to quiet land titles in California," having met, after full conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows: That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House, including the first proviso of the tenth amendment, as follows: "Provided, however, That from decrees of the district court, as aforesaid, made after July 1, 1865, and prior to the passage of this act, an appeal may be taken to the United States circuit court of the State of California within one year from the approval of this act."

That the House recede from the second proviso of said tenth amendment; and the House agrees to the same.

S. C. POMEROY,
JOHN CONNESS,
W. SPRAGUE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. BIDWELL,
G. W. ANDERSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was agreed to.

Mr. BIDWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred a resolution of the House for the investigation of the affairs of the Merchants' National Bank, made a report, accompanied by the following resolution, and demanded the previous question thereon:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to institute such legal proceedings as may be deemed necessary for the punishment of the managers of the Merchants' National Bank, and others who may have aided and abetted them in committing a breach of trust by employing the public money intrusted to them for safe-keeping, and also such proceedings as may be necessary to recover any portion of said money.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I raise a question of order. I understand that to be only a part of the report.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move the acceptance of the report as well as the passage of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is before the House for action.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That authenticated copies of all the evidence be transmitted by the Clerk of the House to the Secretary of War, to be used and disposed of in such manner as he may deem the public interest requires, and after such copies, the evidence as made be recommended to the committee, with authority to publish such as they may deem necessary.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire, if the gentleman will yield to me, to move as an amendment, that all the evidence taken by the committee be printed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. No, sir, I cannot yield for any such purpose. There are seven or eight hundred pages of this testimony, which spread over a great deal of unnecessary matter. I think there are decided objections to its publication. It would make at least two hundred and fifty printed pages. I think it altogether unnecessary to print it.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say that I was, and still am, in favor of the printing of this testimony, but there seemed to be insuperable objections on the part of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I am certainly in favor of printing all the testimony.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I think my motion covers all that is necessary. It is to recommit the evidence to the committee and authorize them to print any portion of it that they may deem proper. That, I think, will cover everything.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Allow me to say a word. It occurs to me that it will avail nothing to refer this matter back to the committee. The only question is whether the evidence taken by the committee should be published or not. Why should it be sent back to the committee? The only question is whether the evidence taken before the committee shall be published or not. The committee are just as well prepared to decide upon it at once as they ever will be. I think myself that a very small number of copies of the whole should be published, and there is a very good reason for it. The committee was detained for a long time because all its members were not present. The committee themselves want all the evidence published in full. Every member of the House wants it in full. It is all sworn testimony, and I think it ought to be printed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I must insist on the previous question.

Mr. LYNCH. I hope the previous question will be voted down.

The question was put upon seconding the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes twenty-two, noes not counted.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. LYNCH. I now move to amend the resolution so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the said report of the Committee on Banking and Currency, together with the testimony taken by the said committee, be printed, and that the said testimony be transmitted by the said Clerk to the Secretary of War, to be used and disposed of in such manner as he may deem the public interest to require.

I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, being upon Mr. LYNCH's motion.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I hope the House will not assent to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The House is acting under the previous question, and no debate is in order unless by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts being heard?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I must object unless I can be heard in reply.

The question was put; and there were—ayes fifty-five, noes not counted.

So Mr. LYNCH's amendment was agreed to. The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

MINING AND MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, bill of the Senate No. 178, to incorporate the Metropolitan Mining and Manufacturing Company, was taken from the Speaker's table, and was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

ASSAULT UPON A MEMBER.

Mr. SPALDING. I now call for the regular order of business.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. SPALDING, from the select committee on breach of privilege, in the matter of Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, of Kentucky, and Hon. JOSIAH B. GRINNELL, of Iowa; upon which the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, the House has seen fit to order an inquiry into all the circumstances connected with the assault by the member from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSSEAU] upon the member from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL], and to instruct the select committee to make a report recommending such action thereon as the committee might see fit. The committee have examined the whole case; they have submitted the testimony taken, and have recommended certain action thereon. A majority of the committee recommend, first, the expulsion of the gentleman from Kentucky for the assault which he committed. They recommend, secondly, a censure of the member from Iowa for the language which he used. And third, they recommend the arraignment of certain parties, other parties—not members of the House—who are held to have been in some sense presumably privy to the assault.

Now, sir, I will first state, as clearly as I can, the facts of the case, not for the purpose of making a statement which shall carry with it the force of an argument on either side, but for the purpose of submitting to the House all the facts essential to a just judgment of the whole case. As it is evidently proper, I will begin with the debate. The debate commenced on the 3d day of February last. The member from Kentucky, speaking on the subject of the Freedmen's Bureau, and while narrating to this House certain circumstances which had taken place under the jurisdiction of the Freedmen's Bureau in his own State, used this language:

"Now, sir, I told the agent of that bureau then just what I thought and felt in reference to this matter. I said to him, 'If you want to protect the freedmen of this community, I am with you heart and soul. I will stand by you in all just measures; but if you intend to arrest white people on the ex parte statements of negroes, and hold them to suit your convenience for trial, and fine and imprison them, then I say that I oppose you; and if you should so arrest and punish me, I would kill you when you set me at liberty.'"

Now, sir, we have nothing to do in this discussion with the sentiment embodied in that declaration; it may be just, or it may be unjust; it may be right, or it may be wrong. That is not the question now. The question is one of parliamentary propriety, and I do not see that there was anything in it in violation of parliamentary order, or of the privileges or rights of any member of this House.

On the 5th of February the member from Iowa replied to that language in the following words:

"The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSSEAU] declared on Saturday, as I caught his language, that if he were arrested on the complaint of a negro and brought before one of the agents of this bureau, when he became free he would shoot him."

It was not distinctly understood by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] whom the member from Kentucky said he would shoot, nor does it make the slightest difference so far as this discussion is concerned. The member from Iowa proceeded to comment upon that declaration, and said:

"Is that civilization? It is the spirit of barbarism, that has too long dwelt in our land—the spirit of the infernal regions that brought on the rebellion and this war."

The colleague [Mr. SMITH] of the member from Kentucky interposed to deny that the member from Kentucky had used any such language. He declared that the gentleman did not belong to the class of men comprehended in the denunciations of the member from Iowa, but that he had served in the Union Army for four years during the war. To which the member from Iowa rejoined:

"I care not whether the gentleman was four years in the war on the Union side or four years on the other side; but I say that he degraded his State and uttered a sentiment I thought unworthy of an American officer when he said that he would do such an act on the complaint of a negro against him."

To which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] replied:

"I deny that my colleague made any such statement."

To which the member from Iowa replied:

"I occupied the Speaker's chair when the gentleman's colleague was speaking, and I heard the words."

But he afterward conceded that the report in the Globe was that upon which comment should be based. That was on the 5th of February. On the 7th of February the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ROUSSEAU], who was not present during the debate of the 5th, recurred to the matter, rising for the purpose of a personal explanation. He then read from the Globe the sentence which I have just recited; that the member from Iowa did not care whether the gentleman from Kentucky had fought on the Union side or on the other side for four years. To that Mr. ROUSSEAU rejoined:

"Mr. Speaker, I did not use the language imputed to me by the member from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL]. And I pronounce the assertion that has just been read, that I have degraded my State and uttered a sentiment unworthy an American officer, to be false, a vile slander, and unworthy to be uttered by any gentleman upon this floor."

It is claimed in this discussion that in that sentence the gentleman from Kentucky offered a distinct and direct insult to the gentleman from Iowa, charging upon him in a personal sense falsehood and slander. Now, I beg to ask the attention of the House for one moment to this point: that the sentiment uttered by the gentleman from Iowa was not the declaration of a fact, nor did it assume to be such a declaration; it was simply the expression of an opinion. It was the opinion of the member from Iowa that the gentleman from Kentucky had "degraded his State" and "uttered a sentiment unworthy an American officer." Now, sir, when you pronounce an opinion false, you do not necessarily charge the man who uttered it with having uttered a falsehood. This distinction is recognized everywhere in all parliamentary bodies. It is recognized here; and it is recognized in the British House of Commons. It was recognized in a case which occurred there a short time ago, when Sir Robert Peel charged a member of that body with having uttered upon the floor what he knew to be false. The Speaker arrested Sir Robert Peel at once, and told him that, although he might pronounce a statement false, without offending parliamentary propriety, he could not add that the member knew it to be false when he uttered it, without violating the privileges of the House; and the Speaker required him to apologize to the House and to the member, before he allowed him to proceed. Now, sir, on the other hand, it follows necessarily from this that when the gentleman from Kentucky pronounced this declaration of the member from Iowa to be false, he did not necessarily charge him with having uttered a falsehood. I am not here to defend the good taste of the language used by the gentleman from Kentucky. I concede that it does not quite correspond to my ideas of what is proper and courteous in debate. It savors a little of what the English are accustomed to call "bounce," and what in this country has hitherto been understood as "southern chivalry." But that, as I conceive, is a matter of taste; it is not necessarily a violation of parliamentary propriety; and I submit that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] did not establish that the gentleman from Kentucky had charged his colleague [Mr. GRINNELL] with falsehood in a personally offensive sense when he attempted yesterday to cite this passage in support of that assertion.

That, sir, was the third incident of the debate, and it happened on the 7th of February. On the 8th of February the gentleman from Iowa rose to a personal explanation, and after reciting the circumstances of the case, referred again to this very point. He said:

"I give the member the full benefit of an explanation of his declaration that he would kill a white officer acting under oath and in the discharge of his duty, if that is a less unworthy act than to shoot an American citizen of African descent. That may not have been degrading to his State, and whether it was, as I said, language unbecoming an American officer is a question which I shall refer to the gallant soldiers of the State of Iowa who never fought, thank God, but on one side."

The gentleman from Kentucky rejoined that he could not allow the gentleman from Iowa "to become the defender of the troops from the free States."

There the matter rested until the 11th of June. There seemed up to that time to have been no such gross violation of parliamentary propriety and of the usages and dignity of debate as has been claimed on this floor. On the 11th of June the gentleman from Kentucky, in closing a speech which he had made, used the following language:

"I said, sir, awhile ago, that slings had been constantly made at my native State, in my hearing, upon this floor; and last and least of all things and everybody, let us give a moment's attention to the member from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL], who first assailed her here. Shortly after Congress assembled he assailed my State and myself. He charged that I had degraded my native State by saying that I would defend my family against the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau. That member was pleased to say on the floor, in answer to suggestion of my colleague, [Mr. SMITH], that he did not know whether I had fought four years on the rebel side or on the Federal side in the late war. I had under my command and fighting under me from that member's State some of the bravest troops from any State in the Union. I was in the war from the beginning of it until the end. In the Northwest I was known to have been in the Federal Army; but that member said he did not know whether I was on the rebel or the Federal side. I do not suppose a member in the House believed one word of what he said."

Mr. GRINNELL here attempted to interrupt him, but the gentleman from Kentucky objected, saying:

"I cannot be interrupted now. I wish to say that when a member can so far depart from what everybody believes he ought to know, and does know is the truth, it is a degradation, not to his State, for he cannot degrade her, but to himself."

There, sir, is language which I admit may fairly be regarded as a violation of the proprieties of debate. It is always a violation of the proprieties of debate to assert that a member states on this floor what he knows to be untrue. No member has a right to rise here and impugn the personal veracity of any other member; and that I think the gentleman from Kentucky did in this particular instance. It is only fair, however, to say that he did it on the assumption that the gentleman from Iowa had said he did not "know" on which side the gentleman from Kentucky had fought during the war. It is true, the Globe has reported it that he "did not care;" but the gentleman from Kentucky assured the committee investigating this case, as he assured the House yesterday, that he was not present (and the record will show the fact) when the gentleman from Iowa made the original declaration, and that he had been told by his colleague from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] that the language of the gentleman from Iowa was that he "neither knew nor cared" on which side the gentleman from Kentucky had fought; and this is urged in extenuation for the language which the latter used in saying that, when the member said he did not "know" on which side he fought, he did not suppose any member of this House believed his statement. That, I think, is nevertheless, a violation of parliamentary propriety.

It is to be noted, sir, that when the gentleman from Iowa did get the floor he did not correct that alleged misunderstanding. He has not corrected it on the floor from that day to this. I do not say that this is a justification for the language used by the gentleman from Kentucky; but I do say that it is a fact which may be taken into account, for it is a fact which may very well have weighed with the gentleman from Kentucky in his views of this matter and in the action he took upon it. On the same day, after the debate had gone on some time, the gentleman from Iowa rose to reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, asking permission to make a personal explanation, which was granted. Now, I do not propose to read at length what the gentleman from Iowa said on that occasion. It was read in full yesterday at the Clerk's desk during the speech of my colleague, [Mr. HALE.] But I call attention to the leading points of it—to this mainly, that it was in no sense a reply to anything the gentleman from Kentucky had said. It was simply a personal attack upon him as a gentleman and as an officer of the Army. No one can read any part of it without seeing that this is its character.

In the first place he refers to his personal appearance, "standing six feet high, wearing buff, and carrying the air of a certain bird that has a more than usual extremity of tail, wanting in the other extremity." He then speaks about his being a defender of the President, and says:

"God save the President from such an incoherent, brainless defender, equal in valor in civil and in military life. His military record! Who has read it? In what volume of history is it found?" * * * "Where was he in the great fights? Ask General Grant if you want his private opinion about him. Go to the general officers; and since he has alluded to Iowa, I will give the opinion of a leading officer from that State, for not two weeks ago he told me that when there was a noise in camp the men said it was either a rabbit or General ROUSSEAU."

He also refers to the gentleman from Kentucky "having a quarrel with his barber and being backed off," and concludes with the following language:

"I did speak something about the men from Kentucky fighting on both sides. Sir, I have been sent here by a majority of seven thousand; and I do not go to the State of Kentucky for indorsement, nor do the soldiers of Iowa. Their record is made, and it was not made under the leadership of any man from Kentucky. It was made under the leadership of their own colonels and generals, and under General Grant and General Sherman. When the gentleman gets up here and claims the honor of having led the Iowa soldiers, I say that they were not so led; that they spurn such an intimation; and in this I mean nothing personal.

Mr. Speaker, this is a painful exposition. But I am not responsible for it. When I make an assault, I expect to receive an assault in return.

* * * And then the gentleman whines off with a woman's plea, taking refuge under feminine skirts as a certain other gentleman went off in disguise."

Now, sir, that is the whole of the debate spread before the House for its judgment. I have already said that I regard the remarks made by the gentleman from Kentucky in charging the gentleman from Iowa with stating what he knew was not true to have been in violation of parliamentary propriety. I have no hesitation in saying that I regard the remarks made by the gentleman from Iowa as an outrage upon all parliamentary propriety and all the courtesies of life in Congress and out of it, and I am perfectly willing to submit that judgment to this House or to the country at large. Well, sir, the gentleman from Kentucky listened to all that debate. He appealed twice to the House for protection, and the House failed in each case to afford it. He said in both cases that unless he could be protected by the House he must protect himself. At the time he forbore any personal resentment of language well calculated to irritate and exasperate any man of sensibility, and four days after that he committed the assault which has brought the matter before the House.

Mr. SPALDING. The gentleman says the House failed to protect the gentleman from Kentucky when he appealed to the House. I do not think he will insist upon his statement when he reflects that the Speaker did immediately call the member to order when appealed to by members.

Mr. RAYMOND. I will give attention to that part of the subject more fully hereafter, provided the gentleman from Ohio will also remember that although called to order for a violation of the rules by the Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa was allowed to proceed and to continue in the same strain. The House certainly did fail to protect the gentleman from Kentucky.

But, sir, as to the facts of the assault, there is neither difficulty nor doubt of any kind. The gentleman from Kentucky came before the committee, and said he had no concealment in the matter at all; he wished the whole thing to be understood precisely as it occurred. He admitted that he made the assault; he admitted that he did it with premeditation; that he did it for words spoken in debate, and he declared that for his purpose was to disgrace the gentleman from Iowa by blows, as the gentleman from Iowa had attempted to disgrace him on the floor. The testimony was of course to the same point. These are the leading facts in the case, and they are fully admitted, as I understand, by the gentleman from Kentucky. It is proposed by the majority of the committee to expel the gentleman from Kentucky for that assault, and to censure the gentleman from Iowa, or rather to disapprove of the language used by him in debate.

Now, sir, great exception has been taken to this report, and an attempt has been made upon this floor to give a wholly one-sided aspect to the transaction. In the first place, the gentleman's colleague from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] whom I do not now see in his seat, entered a point of order claiming that under the rules of the House the House had no right to censure the member from Iowa for the language used by him. He attempted in the first place to screen his colleague from any censure or punishment under the technical rules of the House. And in the next place, the gentleman from Iowa, arguing for his colleague, attempted to show that his colleague had done nothing worthy of censure or disapprobation.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Does the gentleman pretend to say that I took that position?

Mr. RAYMOND. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I did not do any such thing. I was answering the position assumed by other members of the House. I was merely answering the case presented by gentlemen who had spoken in behalf of Mr. ROUSSEAU.

Mr. RAYMOND. I said nothing about the reasons which actuated the gentleman. I said that his argument was calculated to produce the idea that his colleague had said nothing to warrant any expression of disapprobation on the part of the House. I certainly heard nothing indicating the slightest disapprobation on his own part, nor do I find anything of the kind in his speech as reported this morning in the Globe. In the next place, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] now presents a proposition intended to accomplish the same object by an adroit parliamentary maneuver, and that is to substitute for the first and second resolutions reported by the committee expelling the gentleman from Kentucky and censuring the member from Iowa, another resolution which merely reprimands the gentleman from Kentucky and omits all mention of the gentleman from Iowa. It says in effect that if nothing shall be said about the language used by the member from Iowa, they will be content with simply reprimanding Mr. ROUSSEAU. Now, I object to that as a partial and one-sided way of acting on the case. I hold that the House owes it to itself and to the freedom and propriety of debate to express an opinion on both points of this case, upon the language of the gentleman from Iowa as well as upon the act of the gentleman from Kentucky.

I have moved to substitute, for the first resolution reported by the committee, another providing for the reprimanding of Mr. ROUSSEAU at the bar of the House. I have done it because I think his offense, judged by the punishment awarded to the gentleman from Iowa, merits no higher punishment than this. If the gentleman from Iowa is to be subjected, not even to the disapprobation of the House, then I say that the gentleman from Kentucky does not merit even the reprimand proposed by myself and the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I consider that the Constitution protects freedom of debate. I concede that for any speech or debate upon this floor no member can be questioned elsewhere. But I think that gentlemen in this discussion have given to that phrase a much wider latitude than it will bear, and I think the majority of the committee claim a degree of inviolability for the persons of members upon this floor that was not intended to be attached to them. They say:

"The theory upon which parliamentary assemblies are founded is that of the inviolability of the person of the representative. The existence and authority of legislative assemblies depend upon the recognition of this fundamental law. This is due not less to the dignity of the assembly and the rights of its members than to the people they represent; an act of violence against a representative is an act of insurrection against the people he represents."

Members have discoursed here about the inviolability of the persons of Representatives, as though that were all that is inviolable in the Representative, and as though nothing else is to be cared for. Why is not the character of a Representative as inviolable as his person? I have said that the person of the Representative is not to be assailed and I insist also that his character is not to be assailed. Some of the ablest commentators on the Constitution insist that that is a proper interpretation of the clause, that while a man for words spoken in debate upon the floor in pursuance of parliamentary rules of order may not be questioned, he may be held responsible if he publishes those remarks to the world; and although a discrimination may be taken that he publishes them by order of the House, you will find the decisions in England to be that though such publications may be made under the order of the House, and for the use of the House, they cannot be published otherwise for the public at large without subjecting the person to the rules of law.

In Massachusetts a case was decided where a member of the House of Representatives was fined $2,500 for slandering another member upon the floor of the House. But I do not propose to go into a discussion of the matter in this way. I do not propose to justify the act of the gentleman from Kentucky. I concur with the majority of the committee in the opinion that it cannot be justified; that it is without justification; and I beg the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] who spoke on this subject yesterday, to understand from this that I do not allow him to confound an attempt to show that an act has excuses with the position that an act is justifiable. He remarked upon the language of my colleague, [Mr. HALE,] who spoke upon this subject yesterday, that while he [Mr. HALE] pretended not to justify the act of the gentleman from Kentucky, all his remarks did actually tend to justify it. I say again that I cannot, and do not, and will not attempt to justify that act; but I do say there were many things connected with this matter, with the unjustifiable assault which he committed, which ought, in all fairness, to afford extenuation for it in the judgment of those who are to pronounce upon it.

Why, sir, you never hear a case in the criminal courts even, where certain things are not allowed to extenuate the offense, although not held to justify it. As I have said, I consider an assault upon character as serious a matter as an assault upon the person. This may be a matter of taste; it is certainly a matter of opinion to a certain extent; it is a matter of temperament, and a matter of natural sensibility. There is a difference in men in this respect. Some are quick to resent personal injuries; others will not resent any injuries at all. We all know that temperaments differ, and that some of the most eminent and noble qualities of the human character lie so close to its faults and vices that sometimes the two are confounded. We all know that firmness in adhering to principle is oftentimes mistaken for obstinacy. The quality which leads some men to look at all sides of a question before pronouncing judgment upon it is often mistaken for vacillation and a lack of decision. We often see that an excess of charity and kindness of heart is mistaken for pusillanimity. And we still more often see that that quick sensibility to insult, that high sense of honor which resents a wrong, whether done to the person or to the character, is closely allied to some of the noblest qualities which can dignify humanity, and especially to that enthusiastic, impulsive temper which makes heroes of men, and enables them to render transcendent service to their country and their age.

Now, I do not think it just to confound all distinctions of character and of temperament in this case, or in any other. I can well understand how the gentleman from Kentucky, with his peculiar temperament, with his education, with the tone of feeling of the community in which he had lived all his life, might feel a degree of sensibility to the remarks of the member from Iowa, that others on this floor cannot understand and still less sympathize with. I feel bound to make allowance for that, not as justifying the act which he has committed, but as extenuating the degree of his criminality, when it is before the House for judgment.

One of the celebrated characters in one of Mr. Bulwer's fictions, I think it was the renowned Mr. McGrowler, remarks that in his experience of life he had found that "there was a great deal of human nature in men"—a very profound remark, and one which I think is substantially true. I think there are very few of us on this floor who could listen with entire equanimity to the remarks made by the gentleman from Iowa. Very few, sir, are there here whom such remarks would not move to resentment. But why, it is asked, did not the gentleman from Kentucky resent them on the spot? Because he chose, of two offenses, to commit the least. If he had resented it on the spot, in presence of the House and in open contempt of its authority and dignity, I take it there would have been no hesitation here in visiting upon him immediate and condign punishment.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] yesterday represented that we were entering upon a new era of parliamentary dignity. He opened his remarks by saying that there had been a time when the dignity of the House was regarded as worthy of protection; but that that time had now gone forever. Sir, he must have forgotten the past history of this House and of the country. He evidently has forgotten the time long years ago when Matthew Lyon, a member of the House from the State of Vermont, spit in the face of Mr. Griswold, a member of this House from the State of Connecticut, when Mr. Griswold resented the indignity and assailed Mr. Lyon upon the spot, and the Speaker of the House descended from the chair and, instead of arresting the disorder, remonstrated with the member who was trying to separate the combatants, saying that it was not the way to stop a fight to take a man by the legs. [Laughter.] He must have forgotten the time when Houston, of Texas, belabored a member of the House of Representatives on the avenue and left him, as it were, dying, unable to stir, or even to call aloud. The gentleman from Iowa must have forgotten the long list of "scrimmages" that have taken place in this House from that day almost to the present time. A former member of this House now in this city handed me to-day a little list of the contests he had witnessed on this floor during the short time he was a member of this House. Among them was the scrimmage between Mr. Clingman and Mr. Stanley, of North Carolina, which resulted in some scratches and blows. Another was one between Mr. Wilcox and Governor Brown, of Mississippi, which he states was a "much prettier fight than the North Carolina one, and looked more like business." Another was a Tennessee fight. Mr. Churchwell, of Tennessee, drew a pistol on his colleague, General Cullom. General Cullom "went for him," bounding over a desk, and denouncing him in a clear ringing voice, which could be heard in the remotest part of the galleries, as a coward and an assassin. Mr. Keitt, of South Carolina, and Mr. Grow, says the same authority, "opened their batteries on each other, and the engagement soon became pretty general along the whole line; Barksdale of Mississippi, Washburne of Illinois, Ruffin of North Carolina, Covode of Pennsylvania, Reuben Davis of Mississippi, Potter of Wisconsin, and others, charging and retiring alternately."

I will not enumerate any more of these contests. I will simply say that the last one alluded to must be fresh in the minds of all the members of this House although they may not have witnessed it. They certainly cannot forget the picture of it given to us a few days ago by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] With his usual parliamentary adroitness, he brought it into his argument to aid in carrying a bill which was in some danger of being lost. He drew a picture of that contest which exceeded in graphic fidelity any description in the histories of our recent wars thus far within my knowledge. Certainly its effect upon the House was something startling. All the members gathered around him and listened in the most respectful silence—conticere omnes; and if gentlemen will pardon the false prosody, I will complete the quotation—as applicable now as it was in the olden time—voces faucibus hesunt, steteruntque comæ. I am sure, sir, our hair stood on end under the narration, and I think that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] himself would have done so but for circumstances over which he probably had no control. [Laughter.] I never knew why that distinguished gentleman should have been so much more terrified with that particular contest than with any of the others that have taken place in his time on this floor until I saw the result of it recorded in the personal diary of the gentleman who handed me this record, in these brief and graphic words: "Poor Barksdale's wig being captured in the row." [Renewed laughter.] That is a sad result unquestionably, but it was not attended with as much carnage as it might have been. I believe, indeed, the wig was captured without the least effusion of blood. But even in that great contest, attended with such results, the House passed no resolution of expulsion; no one was banished even for seizing Barksdale's wig; the House passed no reprimand upon anybody; no, it did not even censure any one, nor express its disapproval of the row in any way whatever.

Indeed, you may examine the history of this House from its beginning to the present time, and you will not find a single one of all the men engaged in these personal collisions, even when they occurred right on the floor in the presence of the Speaker, when pistols and bowie-knives were drawn and when blood was shed, who has been expelled. Matthew Lyon was not expelled. Preston S. Brooks, even, was not expelled for his murderous outrage on Senator SUMNER. This is to be the first instance of expulsion, if you expel the gentleman from Kentucky, for any collision of this kind. Now, sir, is there anything in the circumstances of this case which calls for expulsion by way of distinguishing it from all the others? As I said, I believe there is much to extenuate in. I know the gentleman from Iowa claims that the gentleman from Kentucky had insulted him. I have cited the only passage in the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky which I think was fairly open to the charge of being in violation of parliamentary propriety. The gentleman from Iowa claimed before the committee that he had received other offenses in the closing speech of the gentleman from Kentucky. He claims that General ROUSSEAU called him "a thing" in the passage of his speech where he said that "last and least of all things he would refer to the gentleman from Iowa." Now, sir, I do not know precisely what was intended by that expression of the gentleman from Kentucky. The language is not perfectly clear, and it may give rise to commentaries in the future as voluminous as those in the past upon doubtful phrases in Homer and Herodotus. But it is not the first instance in which a person who was called "a thing" has resented it. The hostess of the "Boar's Head" in Eastcheap was called a thing by Sir John Falstaff, who complained bitterly that his pocket had been picked in her establishment. It could not be expected that this ornament of her sex could tamely submit to such an imputation upon her character. Like a woman of spirit as she was she demanded to know "what thing" Sir John meant to call her. Nor was she as much appeased as, perhaps, she should have been when the gallant Sir John responded, "a thing to thank God upon;" and though she exclaimed she was no such thing and called on all who knew her to bear her witness, still, if the gentleman from Iowa had made a similar demand on his accuser, he might have received the response in a more kindly spirit. But I do not think the offense in his case, any more than in that of the virtuous Dame Quickly, quite so serious as both seem to have deemed it.

Now, sir, I say further, it is to be regarded as an extenuation of his offense that the gentleman from Kentucky was forced to submit to a most serious and insulting impeachment of his military character and his personal courage upon this floor, in hearing of the House and to go upon the permanent record of our debates. In my judgement it makes no difference whether the gentleman from Iowa said he did not "know" or did not "care" on which side the gentleman from Kentucky had fought. I hold it as much an offense against propriety, against all just feeling, for him to say that he did not care, as that he did not know, whether he was on the rebel or on the Union side. I say that the attack upon the military character of Mr. ROUSSEAU was an unpardonable outrage perpetrated on the floor upon the character and history of one whom no gentleman in this House or elsewhere had any right to depreciate or any excuse in depreciating in any such connection.

said yesterday that it seemed as though the character of no man was of any consequence here unless he had been in the Army. I beg to know of how much consequence would be the character of any man in the Army if it is to be assailed as the gentleman from Iowa assailed that of the gentleman from Kentucky, with entire and complete impunity. Sir, we owe it to ourselves, to our self-respect, to our country and to posterity, to cherish as the apple of our eye, or the very core of our hearts, the reputation of those who have led our armies in this great fight, and won for us as well as for themselves distinguished honor on the battlefield. And when I see so many of these gentlemen around me, now members of this House, who have, on the field of battle, as well as in this council chamber, stood firm and fast to the Union of the States, who have risked life and everything dear to them for the sake of the nation, and whose deeds are so certain to pass into the priceless treasures of our country's history, I feel like pardoning almost anything they may say or do, and like holding every man my foe who assails their fair fame and traduces their character or their reputation for political differences or for differences of any kind.

The military character and career of the gentleman from Kentucky are so well known that neither the gentleman from Iowa nor any other gentleman on this floor is excusable for overlooking or disparaging them. When violent hands were first raised against the Government and the Constitution and Kentucky attempted to stand neutral, he planted himself almost alone against the efforts of those who would hold her back from the full support of the Union and the Constitution. Almost alone in the Senate of that State he denounced all sympathy with secession as treason and rebellion. He denounced the attempt of the Governor to hold a special session in order to hear a secession commissioner from Alabama. He denounced the Senate for attempting to sit in secret session for the purpose of giving them audience, not only as a breach of parliamentary propriety, but as a crime against the people, and told the Senate, probably in violation of order and of the Senate's privileges, that if they did close the doors during that debate, he would break them open with his own arm, and he defied them to stop him if they dared. And when the war broke out, where was he found? From the first moment until the closing gun was fired in the forefront of the great encounter. The reports of his commanding officers, from the highest to the lowest, bear such testimony to his valor, his good disposition of his troops, his determination always and everywhere to fight the foes of his country and to save the nation or perish in her defense as should forever silence the thought that would do him insult or injury. I will not go over that history. I say that what he has done for the country entitles him to impunity from assault on his character or person in this place, or elsewhere; in the second place, it entitles him to protection at the hands of this House from assaults upon him here; and in the third place, all such protection failing him, it entitles him to the most charitable construction upon any act he may have performed in the vindication of his character against insult and aspersion. That was one of the reasons assigned by the minority of the committee for qualifying the motion to expel, and what I have said has been in support of that recommendation.

The committee report in connection with this transaction, and giving to it what I deem not quite a fair construction, that three persons were present who were friends of General ROUSSEAU and were armed. The report of the majority of the committee says:

"Three persons were present as friends of Mr. ROUSSEAU: the first on account of information received from Mr. ROUSSEAU that a personal assault was possible, if not probable; the second on account of a suggestion or a call from the first; and the third followed Mr. ROUSSEAU to the portico on account of his excited appearance and manner when passing through the rotunda."

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] yesterday dwelt still more strongly upon this point and impressed upon the House the idea that it was a most remarkable thing that these three men, the friends of General ROUSSEAU, all armed, should have been present on that occasion. Now, it is very hard to argue against innuendo, and this is nothing but innuendo. There may be circumstances which, in the absence of other facts, might give color to the insinuation that these men were present on invitation of General ROUSSEAU for the purpose of aiding him in the assault; but I submit to the gentleman from Iowa that in view of the circumstances of the case there is no possible excuse for his putting it in that light.

Colonel Pennybaker, it is admitted, had been told by General ROUSSEAU of the probable assault. The testimony shows precisely what he was told. Colonel Pennybaker, I may say here, was an old personal friend of General ROUSSEAU, and had known him from boyhood. He was in the Senate of Kentucky at the same time with General ROUSSEAU, and was almost the only member of that body who supported him in his opposition to secession. He testifies that on the morning of the day the assault was committed General ROUSSEAU told him that GRINNELL had used language toward him which he could not submit to, and that unless he had an apology he should probably chastise him. The evidence then goes on as follows:

"Question. Did he say he was going to chastise him, to flog him, or what?"

"Answer. I do not remember what particular expression he used. It is my recollection he said he was going to use a raitan."

"Question. At what time was this?"

"Answer. About half past eleven in the morning."

"Question. Where was it the general told you this?"

"Answer. It was in the yard below here, between here and the Capitol gate, coming toward the Capitol, between eleven and twelve o'clock."

"Question. Did he not tell you on the way when or where he desired to do it?"

"Answer. No, sir. I rather inferred from his talk that he contemplated it that evening."

"Question. In consequence of that information did you stay by during that afternoon?"

"Answer. I returned, and went up to the House in consequence of that information that evening."

"Question. Did you go at the request of General ROUSSEAU?"

"Answer. No; the general did not make any request at all. He asked me to come up in the evening, and I arrived there not more than ten minutes before the House adjourned."

Now, Pennybaker was informed by ROUSSEAU of the probable assault, but there is nothing whatever to show that he was invited there for the purpose of taking any part in the affair or in any other capacity than as a witness of the assault. Colonel Pennybaker has been in the Army and was in the habit of carrying arms, and he testifies that on hearing of this contemplated assault he went to his room and took a pistol and came with it up to the House. With the exception of that single incident there is not a shadow of suspicion that anybody was informed by General ROUSSEAU of his intended assault upon the member from Iowa.

Colonel Grigsby, who was the second party present who is named here, testifies in answer to General ROUSSEAU's questions as follows:

"Question. I ask you if anything had ever occurred between you and myself which led you to believe that this thing was to take place."

"Answer. Nothing whatever. I only arrived in the city a day or two before. I had not seen General ROUSSEAU until I saw him at the Capitol since 1862, when we were in the Army together, and I only was with him three minutes before we went out at the door."

"Question. Did I even know you were present on the portico until you came up to me?"

"Answer. I had no reason to suppose you did at all. I was following Colonel Pennybaker. I supposed you were running to get into a car. I never dreamed of anything of the sort occurring."

I read further from his testimony:

"By Mr. BANKS:

"Question. Do you ever carry arms upon your person?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. Were you armed on this occasion?"

"Answer. I had a small Deringer pistol in my pocket."

"Question. How long had you had that?"

"Answer. I had carried it ever since I left the Army. I do not suppose it has been out of my pocket in twelve months."

"By Mr. ROUSSEAU:

"Question. You did not have it with you for this particular occasion?"

"Answer. No, sir; for I did not know of any such occasion. The condition of society has been such in our town that it would not be safe to be unarmed. It is rather the exception than the rule for gentlemen not to carry arms, especially one who has been in the Federal Army."

"Question. I understand you to say distinctly that you had no knowledge or intimation that anything of this sort was to occur?"

"Answer. Not the slightest. I was very much surprised when I saw you raise your hand, and I had no idea who you were striking."

But it is said that Colonel Pennybaker told Colonel Grigsby of this affair, and that in consequence the latter was there. That, sir, is negatively distinctly by the declaration of Colonel Grigsby himself, in reply to a question by Mr. WILSON.

"Question. You stated that Colonel Pennybaker came up with you?"

"Answer. Yes. Colonel Pennybaker went over to my room to take a drink with me. He was talking about matters, and said he must go to the House. I told him I would go with him if he had no objections."

And in a subsequent part of the testimony he states that what he came for was to see Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, a member of the House, and that he simply went out with Pennybaker because he supposed he was going.

Colonel McGrew, the other person who was there armed, testifies in equally strong language that he never heard anything of the affair from anybody at any time.

"Question. Did any one else ever intimate to you after that time that probably he would assault Mr. GRINNELL?"

"Answer. No, sir; I never heard anything of the case until the day it occurred."

"Question. When you followed Mr. ROUSSEAU from the Rotunda that day was it with the expectation of any such occurrence?"

"Answer. He seemed to pass me without answering, and I followed him out more to know what was the matter."

"Question. Then when you followed Mr. ROUSSEAU out you had no thought of a collision?"

"Answer. No, sir; none at all."

"By the CHAIRMAN:

"Question. Did you have an interview with Colonel Pennybaker that evening or that day with reference to this transaction?"

"Answer. Not until afterward."

Again:

"Question. Did it strike you at the moment there might be some personal difficulty, and was that the reason for your following?"

"Answer. No; it was not for that reason at all that I followed him. I followed him for the express purpose of knowing whether he was going to New York."

That is all there is about those three men. Colonel Pennybaker was told that there might be a collision, and came up. As to the other two parties, the testimony of every witness—uncontradicted, undoubted, not a shadow of suspicion thrown upon it—tends to show that they were there accidentally. Why, then, it may be asked, were they armed? Simply, as they have already explained, because it was their custom to be armed. But why, it may be asked, was nobody else armed? If any one will tell me what reason he has for supposing that nobody else was armed, then I may think it worth while to answer that question. It must be recollected that out of the fifteen or twenty persons who, according to the testimony, were present, these three and no others were singled out and examined on that point. But I think gentlemen understand pretty well that it has become quite fashionable—quite too fashionable—a fashion much "more honored in the breach than in the observance," to carry arms on the person. These three men did it, and were detected. How many more did it and were not detected it is not for me to say. But I submit that, whatever may be the disposition by the House of these gentlemen themselves, whatever view the House may take of their conduct, there is nothing whatever in this evidence to show that they were there by procurement of General ROUSSEAU—nothing whatever to show that they knew aught of his purposes; that he had lifted a finger or done a thing to have them there at that particular time; and the coincidence which the gentleman from Iowa referred to yesterday is simply a coincidence, and nothing more.

Now, sir, I do not care to say anything further on the general question. I should be glad to have the House decide by a distinct vote between the proposition for expulsion and the proposition for a reprimand. I think that is a fair issue; but I desire to repeat again that I do not think it fair to punish General ROUSSEAU, one of the parties in this case, for his violation of the privileges of the House, without at the same time inflicting some censure or at least disapprobation upon the gentleman from Iowa, by whom that violation was provoked.

Freedom of debate, sir, must be protected. It ought to be protected. The dignity of debate must be protected. It is due to ourselves, it is due to the proprieties of our proceeding, it is due to the attainment of the end for which we are here that it should be thoroughly and effectively protected. But I submit to this House whether the way to protect it is to allow one member to assail another in the grossest and most insulting terms without doing anything to protect him, and then to inflict punishment upon him for attempting to protect himself. I submit, sir, that if we are to protect the freedom and dignity of debate we must check its abuses, and thus give no man either provocation or excuse for assailing it. As between members, entitled to equal privileges and equal protection, the protection must be equal and impartial.

Here let me refer to a point mentioned in the report of the minority as another reason in extenuation; and that is, that General ROUSSEAU failed to receive the protection of the House. He appealed for it twice distinctly, saying each time that unless the House would protect him he must protect himself. The gentleman from Iowa was, it is true, called to order by the Speaker; but, sir, he was not, as the rules require, compelled to take his seat and await the decision of the House whether he should proceed or not. In the first instance, when he was called to order, the Speaker said very properly that his remarks were out of order. But he went on. Again he was called to order, and then the Speaker said:

"The Chair sustains the point. The gentleman from Iowa is out of order in this course of remark, and as the gentleman has been twice called to order the Chair will check him if he again violates the rule."

That is not protection, sir. And when the gentleman from Iowa did again violate the rule, and the Speaker said, "The Chair thinks that the remarks of the gentleman are out of order," the gentleman replied, "I have nothing further to say." He was allowed from the beginning to the end to go through the whole of his tirade and to say all he wished to say without being once called to order by the House and silenced. That was not protection to the gentleman assailed. It was simply protection to his assailant. The gentleman from Iowa enjoyed complete impunity throughout the whole of his remarks for whatever he chose to say.

Now, sir, I wish to say in the first place that I think the Speaker acted upon his own conviction of the proprieties of his position in allowing members to call to order when any violation of order was committed in the course of a personal explanation. The reason which he gave for his opinion the other day, namely, that he alone of all the members of the House is not asked for his consent, I should say, as an abstract proposition, is not a sound reason, simply because the Speaker of this House is also a member of this House; and he loses none of his rights as a member of this House by the fact that additional rights and powers have been placed in his hands by virtue of his position as Speaker. I think it is just as competent for the Speaker to object in such a case as it is for any other member. A sense of propriety or a sense of courtesy may restrain him from the exercise of it. But, as to the right, I do not know of any positive rule which denies it to the Speaker; and in the absence of any such rule I should say that the right exists. In the limited experience I have had as a presiding officer in the State Legislature I have always acted on the assumption that I still possessed all the rights of a member, and never hesitated to exercise those rights in case of necessity.

But that is not here a material point. The House failed to silence the member from Iowa while he was insulting the member from Kentucky. Now, sir, that is a reason why the House should be lenient in dealing with the gentleman from Kentucky—in passing judgment upon him. I urge it as such a reason, and in no other way. I say that when the House of its own free motion failed to protect the gentleman, every member sitting still in his seat and forbearing to exercise the right belonging to him, notwithstanding a direct appeal twice repeated from the gentleman from Kentucky to exercise that right and screen him from insult, it is not just for the House thus acting to visit with undue severity the gentleman who seeks for himself the protection which the House refuses to give him.

As I have already remarked, freedom of debate must be protected; but I submit that this mode and manner of protection must be governed by the reason for the protection. Why should we protect freedom of debate? Why do we have debate at all? In order that in the discussion of all questions of public interest, both great and small, the utmost freedom of discussion may be allowed. This is the right of every one, and should not in the least be violated or infringed. But I say that no member should be allowed to take advantage of this freedom of debate thus secured to assail the personal character of another member. Possibly he may have the abstract right under the rules to do it. It may be his right, clear and undoubted, to say just what he pleases in regard to any one whom he may select for the object of his assault. That, sir, is not in question now. The question is, suppose he avails himself of that right, is he entitled to undue exceptional leniency at the hands of the House if he abuses the right which it thus allows him to exercise? It seems to me he is not. I think we owe it to ourselves to reform the evils and abuses that exist in this respect. We owe it to the dignity of this House and to the proprieties of our debates to restrain intemperate personal abuse, wanton assaults upon personal character—assaults which throw no light upon the subjects discussed and only arouse the passions and just resentments of those upon whom they are made; and if there be any defect in our rules in this regard; if there be any lack of power in the Speaker's hands to check these evils and prevent abuses of the freedom of debate which will, unless checked, inevitably lead to personal collisions and assaults, I shall take great pleasure in attempting, with the concurrence and aid of others, to devise a remedy.

Mr. BOYER obtained the floor.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me a moment?

Mr. BOYER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I desire to inquire whether the amendment which I offered yesterday is before the House.

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair stated distinctly that the gentleman had not power to move an amendment to the amendment at that time. The Chair will state the circumstances as they occurred when the gentleman from Kentucky endeavored to offer his amendment.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] appealed to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] to withdraw the demand for a separate vote and to have the previous question upon the pending amendment to the amendment, so that when that was disposed of the gentleman from Pennsylvania could offer an amendment to the amendment. The gentleman from Ohio consented to that. He demanded the previous question on the amendment to the amendment and withdrew his demand for a separate vote. When this had been done the gentleman from Kentucky insisted that he had the right to offer an amendment. The Chair ruled that, as the call for a separate vote had been withdrawn and the previous question demanded at the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he had, according to usage, the right to move an amendment to the amendment. He did offer such an amendment, and that is now the pending proposition. As it is an amendment to an amendment no additional amendment can be offered at present.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I understand afterwards, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] had the floor, he yielded to me for the purpose of having my amendment read. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] has been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania moved to amend, which is as far as the rules allow, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Pennsylvania did not offer any amendment.

The SPEAKER. He did offer an amendment, to strike out the first and second resolutions and insert that reported by the minority, which is the pending proposition.

Mr. RAYMOND. I wish to inquire whether the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania overrides the privilege of a member to call for a separate vote.

The SPEAKER. It does if it is agreed to; but if it should fail then a separate vote can be taken on the separate resolutions.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Was it not the understanding that we should have a separate vote?

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Ohio withdrew his demand for a separate vote for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Pennsylvania to move an amendment.

Mr. HALE. I raise a question of order, whether the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, being in the nature of a substitute for the substitute proposed by my colleague, it is not now in order to move to amend the amendment of my colleague in the way of perfecting it.

The SPEAKER. Both are substitutes.

Mr. HALE. My point is, whether it is not in order to move to amend the proposition of my colleague by striking out certain words and inserting certain others, not making a substitute for it but modifying it.

The SPEAKER. It is not; but the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] can modify it himself before the vote is taken.

Mr. HALE. I supposed that any motion to amend for the purpose of perfecting the original resolution was in order before adopting the substitute.

The SPEAKER. It is a substitute for an entire resolution. If either one was partial in its character then it could be perfected, but they are all of them submitted as a whole, and they cannot be amended by any rule known to the House.

Mr. RAYMOND. Suppose the resolution moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania as a substitute for the first two should be carried, will it then be in order to take a separate vote on the second of the two?

The SPEAKER. After that substitute shall have been agreed to no part can be stricken out; but a majority can add to anything that has been inserted if it is germane to the subject.

Mr. RAYMOND. Then if the resolution moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is adopted and a reprimand is substituted for expulsion, after that it will be competent for the House to pass a resolution disapproving of the conduct of the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. It will be competent for the House to add to the language of the resolution, but not to add a separate resolution. It must all be one resolution. No part of what is ordered to be inserted can be stricken out. The Chair will refer to the Digest, page 11.

Mr. BOYER. Mr. Speaker, if I had obtained the floor yesterday at the time I sought it, I perhaps should have discussed at some length one or two questions involved in this case. At this stage of the debate I shall have very little to say. I do not find fault with the committee for having decided that both the gentleman from Kentucky and the member from Iowa were guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House. I do not find fault with them for having recommended that each should receive some punishment at the hands of the House. But I deny the justice of the discrimination in regard to the penalties which they have recommended, and I take issue with them upon the doctrine which they proclaim, that no words can be spoken on the floor of this House which would in any degree excuse the resentment of them in any other place. The degree of provocation which one member receives from another by the use of improper, intemperate, and abusive language must always be taken into consideration when you undertake to judge of the act which it has provoked. You may lay down rules, it is true, which provide for no excuse for an act no matter by what provocation it may be instigated; but you cannot repeal the laws of human nature; you cannot repeal the sense of honor which regulates the intercourse of gentlemen; you cannot repeal the public opinion which justifies a man for resenting certain gross affronts, whether the act by which he undertakes to enforce his resentment be according to the strict letter of the law or not. In this case I cannot bring my mind to see that the facts—

Mr. O'NEILL. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. BOYER. Certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL. Do I understand him to advocate the code of dueling?

Mr. BOYER. No sir; I said nothing to justify the gentleman in drawing any such inference, and if he waits until I conclude it is very probable the necessity for the question will be avoided.

Mr. O'NEILL. I only judge from the tenor of the gentleman's remarks that he intended to make that argument.

Mr. BOYER. The gentleman has not yet heard much of my argument; if he will have a little patience we shall probably soon have a better understanding of each other.

I cannot, as I was about to say, bring my mind to see the vast distinction which has been made by the committee between a breach of privilege which has been committed against this House by the member from Iowa, and that committed by the gentleman from Kentucky. It is difficult to conceive of a personal attack made by words upon a member of this House more gross and contrary to the proper order and decorum of this body, than that which was made by the member from Iowa upon the gentleman from Kentucky. He called him an incoherent, brainless defender of the President. He said that as a general he had no record; that as a soldier he was without courage. He denounced him as a pretender, and insinuated that he was held in contempt by General Grant and other officers of the Army. The member from Iowa was called to order, it is true, but he was afterward permitted to go on to the end. He was twice mildly rebuked by the Speaker, when invoked by other members to interfere, but still he was permitted to proceed not only in order, but out of order, until he had exhausted the entire budget of his foul invective.

I maintain that this House by having allowed that attack upon the gentleman from Kentucky to be continued after the gentleman from Kentucky had twice given warning that unless he was protected by the House he would be obliged to protect himself, put itself in the wrong. By that omission on the part of the House to extend to the gentleman from Kentucky that protection to which as a member of this House he was entitled, it failed to vindicate its own dignity as well as the rights of the member so assailed; and it could not with any degree of propriety or justice visit upon the head of the gentleman from Kentucky the penalty which the committee has proposed. Before the House can justly punish with severity a member for a breach of its privileges it should see that he has no cause of complaint for not having had that protection which the rules of the House and the rules of decorum afford him.

In the British Parliament they manage these matters in a different way, and I desire to call the attention of the House to the rules and usage in the House of Lords and the House of Commons in this particular. There they are swift to punish any breach of the privileges of Parliament; but they begin by extending to the member first assailed the most ample protection. They do not permit the occasion to pass without visiting upon the member who offends by the personal abuse of another the rebuke which he deserves for the violation of the dignity of the body to which he belongs. In the House of Lords the following rule prevails, having been enacted as long ago as 1626. I quote from May's Law and Usage of Parliament, page 319:

"To prevent misunderstanding and for avoiding of offensive speeches when matters are debating, either in the House or at committees, it is for honor sake thought fit and so ordered that all personal, sharp, or taxing speeches be forborne; and whosoever answereth another man's speech shall apply his answer to the matter without wrong to the person; and as nothing offensive is to be spoken, so nothing is to be ill taken if the party that speaks it shall presently make a fair exposition or clear denial of the words that might bear any ill construction; and if any offense be given in that kind, as the House itself will be very sensible thereof, so it will sharply censure the offender and give the party offended a fit reparation and a full satisfaction."

In the House of Commons substantially the same rule prevails. The author says:

"The House of Commons will insist upon the offensive words being withdrawn, and upon an ample apology being made, which shall satisfy both the House and the member to whom the offense has been given. If the apology be refused, or if the offended member decline to express his satisfaction, the House take immediate measures for preventing the quarrel from being pursued further by committing both the members to the custody of the sergeant."

In a notable instance when, in the heat of debate, personalities were resorted to by Mr. Fox in his debate with Mr. Wedderburne, and he was about to leave the House without having made an apology, the doors were locked, and he was kept in the hall until he had satisfied the House for his offense against its dignity, and had by an apology rendered a proper reparation to the injured member.

Sir, if the Congress of the United States were to adopt and enforce such rules as these there would be no excuse for a gentleman on account of abusive words made use of against him in debate to resort to a cane or to any other instrument for the infliction of personal chastisement in a case like this. Because when the House had judged of the case, and had exacted the amount of reparation which it deemed to be due that would put an end to controversy. But that is the very thing which the House neglected to do in this case.

It is scarcely worth while for the majority of the committee to tell us that there can be no such thing as an excuse for a gentleman under any circumstances resorting to redress outside of the House for slanders uttered in debate. Public sentiment in such cases, if it does not prescribe the law on the statute-book, will make the law which in effect repeals and supplies it. Bad as it is this is perhaps not the worst case of personal abuse that might be imagined. Is there a gentleman upon this floor who cannot imagine a slander repeated against him or his, not to resent which would make him a mark for the contempt of any community in which he happened to live? There are offenses of that kind which might be committed which any member's constituency would justify him in resenting by a castigation even still more severe than that administered to the member from Iowa. Not only is the provocation to be taken into consideration, but before this House can decide justly in this case it must consider the neglect of its own duty in not having provided against this contingency by the prompt enforcement of its own rules.

Now, sir, while the committee recommend that expulsion, the very highest penalty which the House can inflict, shall be visited upon the member from Kentucky, they only recommend that the House express its disapprobation of the conduct of the member from Iowa. They simply say, to use their own words, that his act "merits the disapprobation of the House." And I say, therefore, that while the penalty which is thus recommended to be inflicted upon the gentleman from Kentucky is, beyond all reason, excessive, that which is proposed to be inflicted upon the gentleman from Iowa is unreasonably mild.

Gentlemen talk about the freedom of debate, and say that it must be preserved. So it must, but not to such an extent as that the moment a gentleman becomes a member of this House he therefore is clothed at once with an unlimited license to become a blackguard. When gentlemen, by their election to this House, win for themselves the designation of "honorable," that is surely no reason why they should less observe the amenities of decent society or that they should cease to have a proper regard for the feelings of others.

The offense committed in this case by the member from Iowa, the committee even say was as great an offense of that nature as could be conceived of. According to the report of the committee in their finding of the facts, the language used by the member from Iowa was malicious and vile in spirit, and utterly false in fact. It was used, too, against a man upon whom no better eulogy can be pronounced than that which was contained in the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] the chairman of the select committee, who reported the resolutions of the majority. But he concludes that, therefore, because the character of General ROUSSEAU is exalted, the more fit subject is he for punishment on account of the offense with which he stands charged. In this, too, I differ with the gentleman from Ohio. I say rather that the higher the character of General ROUSSEAU, the greater is the offense which has been committed by the member from Iowa in thus falsely and maliciously assailing him on this floor. Let the House, therefore, before it judges the gentleman from Kentucky, judge itself. Let this House see whether it has done its own duty in this matter—whether it has interposed when it should have interposed and afforded to the gentleman from Kentucky such protection and reparation as deprived him of all reasonable excuse for afterward taking his character and his honor into his own keeping. This is the question which the House must first decide before it can justly decide against him upon either of the resolutions reported by the committee. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, this House is sitting as a court of justice in the discharge of an unpleasant duty to itself and the country, growing out of a personal difficulty between two of its members, and however much we may regret the occurrences which have called forth this investigation and now demands our action, we owe it to ourselves, to the country, and to posterity as well as to the gentlemen arraigned, that we should free our minds of all possible bias, personal or partisan, and discuss and decide these questions with strict impartiality and according to our best judgment. And inasmuch as the questions involved are of a judicial nature, I propose to discuss them as if they were pending in a court of justice, and for this purpose I adopt the majority report of the committee so far as the statement of facts is concerned, and viewing them from the impartial position or stand-point which my personal and political relations toward the gentlemen more immediately involved warrant me in claiming, I proceed at once to state some of the reasons which have led me to conclusions different from those of the committee.

The admission of the honorable chairman of the committee that the paragraph in the report which refers to Colonel Pennybaker, Colonel Grigsby, and Dr. McGrew, as having been present at the assault and battery "as friends" of General ROUSSEAU should not be held to mean that they were there by any previous arrangement of that gentleman, relieves the case of much difficulty; and he having also admitted that the testimony warrants a correction of that part of the report which affirms that Mr. GRINNELL was not actuated by malice or personal feeling toward Mr. ROUSSEAU, another ugly feature in the report falls to the ground, and with it must also fall the censure that is directed toward Colonel Grigsby and Dr. McGrew for being present with loaded pistols. For if they were not there as friends of General ROUSSEAU by previous arrangement, it will be difficult to hold them, and much more difficult and unreasonable to hold him responsible for their presence upon that occasion, and inasmuch as no use was attempted or previously intended to be made of those weapons, the fact of their existence there at the time can have nothing to do with the case except to embarrass it.

Stripped, therefore, of all cumulative matter, the case stands briefly as follows: Mr. GRINNELL feeling himself insulted at some allusion which General ROUSSEAU made to him at a mass meeting in New York, in which he was referred to as "one Grinnell," and also at some allusions which were made to him in this House, which all agree were parliamentary, took occasion to obtain unanimous consent to make a personal explanation and in the course of that explanation used language which was not only unparliamentary, but of a character the most offensive that it is possible to conceive; language which, if believed, must transmit the name of General ROUSSEAU to posterity with everlasting infamy. Called to order, he resumed his seat, and up to this hour, although his attention has been called to this matter by the raising of the committee, by the investigation before that committee, by the report of the committee, and by the debate on this floor, yet he has maintained a most sullen silence, and has not even suggested or allowed any suggestion to be made that he is willing to offer any apology to the House for this violation of its order, decorum, and dignity; much less has he shown any disposition to apologize to General ROUSSEAU for his assault upon him, nor has he signified his willingness to retract the imputation of cowardice which he has made toward a gallant and brave officer of the Army, although the united voice of the whole country, the sentiment of this House and all the matters relating to this investigation concur in denouncing his statement as having no foundation in truth, but made without any personal knowledge of his own, and upon information which, to say the least of it, is false.

Yet, sir, by the majority report we are called upon to expel the one and to say that we disapprove of the course of the other. This I cannot do. I had doubt of our authority to disapprove because of the technical objection that the words were not specifically objected to and by request taken down in writing at the time, but I now agree with the Speaker that they were objected to, and inasmuch as our corps of most efficient and faithful reporters did in this case, and always do, put in writing all words spoken in debate or otherwise upon the floor, they were taken down, not by any special request, but under the general regulation substantially according to the facts; so I have no longer any difficulty on that score.

The language having been used while occupying the floor of the House, and being clearly unparliamentary and highly offensive, I have no hesitation in entering my unqualified disapproval of it, nor have I any doubt of our authority to do so under the rules of this House. This disposed of, we come to the proposition to expel the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ROUSSEAU,] and very naturally we ask the question, why expel the one and not the other? Before I can vote to expel one who holds his seat by the same right that I hold mine, and thus deprive an American constituency of its rightful and chosen Representative on this floor, I must be well satisfied of its forfeiture and of my right to pronounce it.

So far as General ROUSSEAU and his acts are concerned, it matters not a single pin that there were any persons present at the castigation, excepting that the act, being committed in so public a manner, is more flagrant. His offense consists in having committed an assault and battery upon a member of Congress for words spoken upon the floor of the House. It is not and it cannot be maintained that this was done in violation of the good order and decorum of this House as an organized body, and therefore the facts that it was done upon the east portico of the main Capitol, about midway between the two Houses of Congress and about one hundred and fifty yards from this Hall, at a time when this House was not in session, do not in any material way change the character of the offense. It is not an offense against the order of this House; the committee do not so contend, and for such an offense the facts give this House no jurisdiction.

The committee, however, affirm that the offense is a personal indignity to a member of this House and was so intended, and that is certainly true; but they have not undertaken to show that we have any authority to punish a member of this House for inflicting an indignity upon the person of one who is also a member; much less do they in any way pretend that for such personal indignity we have a right to deprive a constituency of its chosen Representative. If we can take cognizance of mere personal indignities offered to members of this House it will matter not where they are committed, whether near the Capitol or far from it, nor when committed, whether before the member is sworn in or after. Such an authority can only be based upon the assumption that the person of a member of Congress becomes sacred by his election; and if another member is to be held responsible at the bar of this House for assaulting one away from the Halls of this House, then any citizen can be so held, while a member may strike a citizen with impunity, so far as this House is concerned; and thus the member becomes a privileged character and members a privileged class, to be recognized and deferred to by the people wherever they are.

Surely, this doctrine does not harmonize with that perfect equality of all men upon which our Government is founded, unless that equality is simply an equality before the law, and then we must turn all such cases over to the courts of law where member and constituent, Congressman and citizen may be tried, not by an undefined and mixed tribunal like this House, but by courts of law and according to the law of the place where the offense is committed. The facts that the party assaulted is a member of Congress, that the object of the assault was to degrade him, and thus lessen his usefulness as a Representative, are matters which a court of justice may well consider, and if committed by a member it is expressly provided that he may be imprisoned and even detained from the House while in actual session for any offense amounting to a breach of the peace. Then why not leave the courts of this District and city to hear and determine this case of assault and battery according to law? Their authority to do so is unquestioned and unquestionable.

But the committee say the offense is a breach of the privileges of this House, guaranteed by the clause of the Constitution which declares that—

"They [members of Congress] shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place."

These are the privileges of members of Congress. Not one word is here said about personal indignities. The arrest referred to is an arrest by process of law, and that process is not suspended except when the member is actually attending to his official duty, and that not because of any sacredness that is supposed to have attached to his person, but because of the right which his constituents have to his services, and the cause of arrest is for debt, libel, slander, or other tort not amounting to a breach of the peace. For these he is not to be arrested while attending to his official duties, but may be arrested at any other time, and the arrest here referred to is very evidently an arrest by legal process. The latter clause declares that for any speech or debate he shall not be questioned, &c. What kind of questioning is here meant? Surely, it is not the right which his constituents have to call him to account for the manner in which he may discharge his duties. The first clause privileges the member from arrest going to, attending upon, and coming from the sessions, &c., and the second privileges him from accountability for what he shall say in speech or debate. Is it not evident that in both of these cases the arrest and questioning mean the same, and have reference only to arrests by legal process and to legal accountability sounding in damages in any court of law?

Could the framers of the Constitution have intended by this clause to protect members from assaults and batteries and personal violence? Are not all men equally protected from such interferences by the law of the land, and were they not so protected at the time of the adoption of the Constitution? Does the Constitution, as it stands, by its omission authorize a violent and unlawful arrest of a member when he is not going to, coming from, or attending upon the session of his House, or had not the second clause been inserted, could a member have been violently held responsible for what he said in speech or debate? If such clause was not necessary for such protection, why was it inserted? Such being the case, why hold General ROUSSEAU for a violation of the Constitution in doing what the Constitution was not intended to prevent? Violent arrests and assaults were then, as now, breaches of the peace and punishable by law throughout the whole country, and the clause in the Constitution was never intended to take this right of trial by jury and according to law from the proper tribunals recognized and authorized under the Constitution. The fact that the Constitution has provided no penalty for such arrests and such questionings proves that it was not intended that Congress should execute the Constitution as the courts do the law. Where do the committee find authority for indicating expulsion as the proper measure of punishment for a breach of privilege in this respect? There is no law fixing that punishment for any offense. They say it is necessary as a means of protection; and that would be a very good argument in favor of the passage of a law to that effect except that expulsions and banishments are not according to our code. Fines and imprisonments are the penalties for crimes in this country that are not capital. If we have authority to fix a certain punishment, because that kind of punishment seems most necessary to prevent the recurrence of the evil, then we may select such as commends itself to the particular case and the party offending, and a majority might favor banishment or the guillotine.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have authority to expel. It is in the Constitution, article one, section five. It is as follows:

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member."

Here, then, is your authority to expel a member as a measure of punishment. When, therefore, we have made rules which prescribe expulsion as a punishment for disorderly behavior, and any member violates such rules we can expel him. Disorderly behavior is behavior in violation of good order, in the parliamentary sense, and may be found in what might be styled parliamentary common law, but ought to be found in the written order and previously adopted rules and regulations of the House. In the absence of such law we cannot now make a rule, a resolution, or an order to take effect after the offense is committed, for that would be ex post facto and is specially prohibited. The Speaker is the organ of the House upon all questions of order. He looks to his rules for his authority to preserve order. His gavel we are all bound to respect, and hearing its sound we are supposed to be silent.

Suppose the honorable Speaker had been present at this castigation, what course would he have taken to prevent it or restore order? By disorderly behavior, in the sense of the Constitution, is meant behavior disorderly as to the rules which the House is authorized to determine, not that kind of behavior which is disorderly as to the public peace and general good order of society. Would he have called the gentleman from Kentucky to order? If he were expected to do that he would have to carry his gavel with him wherever he goes, and our Sergeant-at-Arms, with his mace, would have to accompany him to enforce his orders. Suppose he had been present, and some one had called the gentleman from Kentucky to order, and having stated his point of order that the gentleman was violating the Constitution, would not the Speaker have answered, as he always does, and very properly, that he can only enforce rules of order, and not the Constitution?

But, Mr. Speaker, I will pass to another clause of the section held to have been violated, and inquire, what is meant by speech or debate, as the words are used in the Constitution? I contend that these words mean legitimate debate, such speech or debate as is tolerated under the rules of the House. Can it be said that because a member obtains the floor and, not being called to order, proceeds to indulge in what may be called mere blackguardism, that the Constitution was intended to protect him because he calls it debate? I use the word blackguardism, not in its offensive sense, but as indicating that kind of offensive language that has no relation to any matter before the House and is personal in its character. I admit that he cannot be sued in a court of justice for what is said upon the floor of the House, although it be the purest blackguardism, for the reason that no court of justice can decide a question of order in this House. Courts are bound to presume that what is permitted to be said on the floor of Congress is said in order and legitimately, and hence it is that even in blackguardism the member is protected without holding that the Constitution intended to go further and authorize us to protect him from assault away from the Hall of the House. General ROUSSEAU is guilty of a crime; he has violated the law, and being a member of Congress he is guilty of a very bad example, and is liable to be punished according to law. The provocation was great, but does not justify the remedy he has chosen.

Were this crime a felony or of such infamous character as to render him unworthy to be associated with gentlemen upon this floor, then we could expel him, no matter where it was committed. And having expelled for such reason we might refuse him a seat for the same reason if reelected, and so an offense warranting expulsion should also warrant rejection as a disqualification to occupy a seat.

He is not only guilty of a crime, but, in my judgment, he is guilty of a great folly. Had he known how little regard was paid to these aspersions of his character, he would, perhaps, have taken no notice of them, but he did not know this. The iron went to his heart. The foul slander was written upon the records of this House and must go down to posterity. He could make no reply, for he could not descend to the same level on which he was assailed. Parliamentary language would take no effect upon his assailant. The charge of cowardice, which it is easy to make and easy to prove if true, yet cannot so easily be disproved though never so false. He could not ask an investigation and his assailant would not. The world read the charge and heard of no denial. The verdict of the country is with him now that the attention of the people is called to his character. The committee have said all that they could to refute the libel so far as mere declarations go. But they ask us to expel him for violating the privileges of debate, and thus dignify the slander by calling it debate. To this I say no, I will not do it. I will not be a party to this slander in any way, and in going out of my way to find authority to expel him I betray my willingness to become a party to the slander. Had he violated the rules of the House I would say so. Were I a judge on the bench, and were the case before me, I would execute the law, but I will not be a volunteer to hunt up some sort of a punishment for a brave man who has done no more to vindicate his honor than he has done.

Under all the circumstances it is well that this investigation has taken place. The truth has been developed, history is set right, and the honor of a gallant soldier stands vindicated before his countrymen. Here I would prefer to stop and gladly vote to lay the whole subject upon the table. If anybody wants a further vindication of the law let him go into the courts and get it, for, thank God, they are again open, open to all, the highest and the lowest, the citizen sovereign and the servant Congressman. Before this tribunal the offender will be punished according to his offense and the established law relating to it. He will not be there arraigned as he seems to be here. There the counsel for the prosecution will not be permitted to wander back to transactions several months ago, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] has done, to weigh and balance accounts between the parties to the end that it may be ascertained whose quarrel was then most just.

Surely this is far fetched, but not any further than much of the debate upon this question, especially that part of the argument of the gentleman from Iowa, that the gentleman from Kentucky had violated his oath to support the Constitution when he struck his colleague with a rattan. If that argument is true, then the gentleman from Kentucky is guilty of treason. Yes, sir, treason against the Constitution, proved by an overt act. Of the same character is the argument relating to the threat to shoot an officer of the Freedmen's Bureau.

All these have really nothing to do with the question before the House, and would be ruled out in a court of justice. Hence the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution in leaving all these matters to be determined in courts of justice according to the established and recognized law of the land. With their decision and determination, with power to appeal, all men ought to be satisfied.

Mr. GARFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will do so.

MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the printing of the testimony accompanying the report of the Committee on Banking and Currency relative to the Merchants' National Bank of this city.

The SPEAKER. That motion will be entered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 145) for a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph.

The message further announced that the Senate, proceeding, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the bill entitled "An act to continue in force and to amend an act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes," returned to the House of Representatives by the President of the United States, with his objections, and sent by the House of Representatives to the Senate, with the message of the President returning the bill, had repassed the same, two thirds of the Senate agreeing thereto.

ASSAULT UPON A MEMBER—AGAIN.

Mr. RAYMOND. The gentleman from Ohio yields to me, and I modify the resolution which I have submitted as a substitute by striking out the words "summoned to the bar of the House and be there publicly reprimanded by the Speaker," and inserting instead the words "and is hereby reprimanded;" so that the resolution will read:

Resolved, That Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU be, and he is hereby, reprimanded for the violation of the rights and privileges of the House, of which he was guilty in the personal assault committed by him upon Hon. J. B. GRINNELL for words spoken in debate.

Mr. STEVENS. Inasmuch as the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] has modified his resolution, I modify my motion so as to strike out the three resolutions reported by the committee and insert the resolution as originally reported by the minority.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the day, and at this late period of the discussion, I regret to occupy the time of the House at all. There have, however, been a few points made during the progress of this discussion, which, at the request of some of the gentlemen who have this subject in charge, I will notice. I wish to say at the outset that both the gentlemen concerned in this assault are personally known to me; both are my personal friends, and I am theirs. I trust, therefore, that nothing that I shall say will be construed as arising in any degree from personal feeling against either of them. The difficulty between these two members began in a war of words, waged at two distinct periods. The first was in February last, beginning with the 3d and ending with the 8th of that month, the history of which is substantially as follows:

1. Saturday, February 3, 1863, (Mr. GRINNELL in the chair.) In a speech on the Freedmen's Bureau bill, Mr. ROUSSEAU, after relating a case of arrest in his own town, reports himself as saying to the officer of the Freedmen's Bureau as follows:

"Now, sir, I told the agent of that bureau then just what I thought and felt in reference to this matter. I said to him, 'If you want to protect the freedmen of this community, I am with you heart and soul. I will stand by you in all just measures; but if you intend to arrest white people on the ex parte statements of negroes, and hold them to suit your convenience for trial, and fine and imprison them, then I say that I oppose you; and if you should so arrest and punish me I would kill you when you set me at liberty; and I think that you would do the same to a man who would treat you in that way, if you are the man I think you are, and the man you ought to be to fill your position here.'"

2. On Monday, February 5, in the course of a general speech on the same subject, Mr. GRINNELL said:

"The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSSEAU] declared on Saturday, as I caught his language, that if he were arrested on the complaint of a negro and brought before one of the agents of this bureau, when he became free he would shoot him. Is that civilization? It is the spirit of barbarism that has too long dwelt in our land, the spirit of infernal regions that brought on the rebellion and this war."

Mr. SMITH. I wish to say that my colleague [Mr. ROUSSEAU] does not belong to that class of men that the gentleman from Iowa speaks of. He served in the Union cause four years during the war.

Mr. GRINNELL. History repeats itself. I care not whether the gentleman was four years in the war on the Union side or four years on the other side; but I say that he degraded his State and uttered a sentiment I thought unworthy of an American officer when he said that he would do such an act on the complaint of a negro against him."

3. On Tuesday, February 6, Mr. ROUSSEAU denied having used the language, and said:

"Mr. Speaker, I did not use the language imputed to me by the member from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL.] And I pronounce the assertion that has just been read, that I have degraded my State and uttered a sentiment unworthy an American officer, to be false, a vile slander, and unworthy to be uttered by any gentleman upon this floor."

4. On Thursday, February 8, Mr. GRINNELL produced the Globe containing Mr. ROUSSEAU's speech of February 3, and claimed he had quoted him correctly. He then said:

"I give the member the full benefit of an explanation of his declaration that he would kill a white officer acting under oath and in the discharge of his duty, if that is a less unworthy act than to shoot an American citizen of African descent. That may not have been degrading to his State, and whether it was, as I said, language unbecoming an American officer is a question which I shall refer to the gallant soldiers of the State of Iowa who never fought, thank God! but on one side, and it may properly be decided by the code of the first of American generals, and referred to the greatest of American captains, the Lieutenant General of the United States."

5. Same day, and immediately, Mr. ROUSSEAU responded as follows:

"Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow the gentleman to become defender of the troops from the free States. I simply wish to say that I have made no reflection upon the soldiers of the various States. I have fought with them, sir, and I only wish that the gentleman from Iowa had been willing to be present to see how bravely and gallantly the troops from his own State and all the free States deported themselves in time of battle."

This concluded the February personalities, in which many unpleasant and severe things were said offensive to good taste and the courtesy due from one member to another, but not so disorderly or unparliamentary as to have led any member to call either of the parties to order. It was such a collision as we have frequently witnessed in this Hall, which we all regret, but which, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] has said, was not in clear and palpable violation of parliamentary privilege.

The conclusion of that whole debate of February seemed to be this, that each party was satisfied with his share in the discussion. The gentleman from Iowa intimated that he might have done the gentleman from Kentucky a wrong, and that if so he was willing to apologize; and the gentleman from Kentucky expressed himself as entirely satisfied with his share in the debate. I supposed that a balance-sheet had been struck, and that their friends would decide which of the two gentlemen "had come out best" in that February rencontre. I take it, therefore, that for all purposes of this investigation, the February matter is out of the case.

In the month of June, four months later, the subject was reopened by the gentleman from Kentucky, in a speech delivered by him in New York, in which, referring to an onslaught made on him in the House, he spoke contemptuously of the gentleman from Iowa as "a pitiable politician from Iowa—one GRINNELL." That is the first incident in the second act of this drama.

On the 11th day of June, during a speech in this House, the gentleman from Kentucky, of his own accord, reopened the case, and reviewed the old discussion between himself and the gentleman from Iowa, as follows:

"I said, sir, awhile ago, that things had been constantly made at my native State, in my hearing, upon this floor; and last and least of all things and everybody, let us give a moment's attention to the member from Iowa, Mr. GRINNELL, who first assailed her here. Shortly after Congress assembled he assailed my State and myself; he charged that I had degraded my native State by saying that I would defend my family against the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau. That member was pleased to say on the floor, in answer to a suggestion of my colleague, [Mr. SMITH] that he did not know whether I had fought four years on the rebel side or on the Federal side in the late war."

I had under my command and fighting under me from that member's State some of the bravest troops from any State in the Union. I was in the war from the beginning of it until the end. In the Northwest I was known to have been in the Federal Army; but that member said he did not know whether I was on the rebel or the Federal side. I do not suppose a member in the House believed one word of what he said."

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker—
Mr. ROUSSEAU. No, sir; I cannot be interrupted now. I wish to say that when a member can so far depart from what everybody believes he ought to know, and does know is the truth, it is a degradation, not to his State, for he cannot degrade her, but to himself."

In this paragraph he distinctly charges the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] with saying two things which the record shows he did not say. In other words, the gentleman from Kentucky very plainly misrepresented the gentleman from Iowa in two particulars, which have been so fully discussed that I hardly need refer to them again. One of them, however, has not, as I think, been properly appreciated or represented by any gentleman who has spoken, and I will advert to it. It is this: the gentleman from Kentucky charged that the gentleman from Iowa had said in his place in the House that he did not know whether the gentleman from Kentucky had fought on the Union side during the war or on the rebel side. Whereas the gentleman really said, "I care not whether the gentleman was four years in the war on the Union side or four years on the other side; but I say he degraded his State and uttered a sentiment I thought unworthy an American officer." Now, I think that gentlemen have not been exactly correct in their comments on that passage. It is quite a different thing to say, "I do not care whether you fought on the Union side or not," from saying, "It makes no difference to my present argument whether you fought on the Union side or on the rebel side." Now, I hold that the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa had precisely the latter scope and meaning. He had stated as his opinion that a certain sentiment uttered by the gentleman from Kentucky was a disgrace to that gentleman's State, and a disgrace to himself, whereupon General SMITH, of Kentucky, said he did not think his colleague ever used the words imputed to him, and called attention to the fact that his colleague fought four years in the Union Army. It was in response to that remark that the gentleman from Iowa said what I have referred to, and I think I have accurately stated the scope and purport of his remark. I do not believe that it can be fairly inferred that he did not care whether General ROUSSEAU fought on the Union or rebel side. It was simply a declaration that the whole question of fighting on the one side or the other was not pertinent to the subject then in debate.

The gentleman from Kentucky, in reopening this conflict of personalities between himself and the gentleman from Iowa, on the 11th of June, also made another misrepresentation. He declared that the gentleman from Iowa had called him an unworthy member, and a disgrace to his State, because he had declared that he would defend his family against the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau. This is clearly misrepresentation, as the record in the Globe already quoted shows. After having made these two palpable misrepresentations he proceeds to say that what the gentleman from Iowa had uttered in the House in February was not only false, but that he did not suppose there was a member on the floor who believed a word that the gentleman said. And he went on to say that the gentleman himself knew that it was not true; and he concluded by saying that the gentleman, in what he had said, had not degraded his State—for he could not degrade her—but that he had degraded himself. Four months and three days after the first controversy had closed, with about equal credit to both parties, the gentleman from Kentucky not only repeats it by two palpable misrepresentations of what had been said by the gentleman from Iowa, but he goes on to declare that every member knew it was false; that the gentleman himself knew it was false, and that he degraded himself in saying so.

Suppose Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Iowa had answered not a word, but had applied to the House to pass a vote of censure on the gentleman from Kentucky for this personal, slanderous assault, is there a member of this House who would not have felt compelled to vote, if not for a censure, at least for a most marked disapprobation of the conduct of the gentleman from Kentucky? Gentlemen say it was a terrible thing for the gentleman from Iowa to impute cowardice to the gentleman from Kentucky and assail his military record. I beg them to remember that to be a man is far greater than to be a general; that to be a man is far greater than to be a legislator; that the man is greater than the office, and that one's manhood is of far more consequence than his professional reputation. I had a thousand times rather be charged with being a failure in the military profession, a failure as a legislator, a failure as a lawyer, a failure in all my official relations, than to be charged with being a failure as a man.

Now, when a man is told on the floor of the House that he is a falsifier, and that every body, himself included, knows he is a falsifier, what, I ask, can be said more offensive? Stinging under this reproach, smarting under this charge, the gentleman from Iowa attempted to make an explanation at the moment, and the privilege of doing so was denied him by the gentleman from Kentucky, who proceeded with that portion of his speech which I have quoted. When he had concluded, the gentleman from Iowa obtained the floor and responded to the attack as follows:

"MR. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest reluctance that I rise to say anything which might seem personal. I have been a member of this House for three sessions, and in all that time I have had no personal controversy save with the member from Kentucky, and no unkind feeling toward any person in the House. I claim to be a man of peace, and to demean myself as becomes a gentleman. But, sir, when any man, I care not whether he stands six feet high, whether he wears buff and assumes the air of a certain bird that has a more than usual extremity of tail, wanting in the other extremity, says that he would not believe what I utter, I will say that I was never called to stand under an imputation of that character in the company of gentlemen.

"The gentleman begins courting sympathy by sustaining the President of the United States preparatory to his assault upon me. Now, sir, if he is a defender of the President of the United States, all I have to say is, God save the President from such an incoherent, brainless defender, equal in valor in civil and in military life! His military record! Who has read it? In what volume of history is it found?

"Some time ago the gentleman asked some of us, 'What did you do in the rebellion but makes speeches?' And he told us that he was in the field and got some little reputation with half-way secession Kentucky. But where was he in any great fight? Ask General Grant or any of the leading officers. Where was he in the great fights? Ask General Grant if you want his private opinion about him. Go to the general officers; and since he has alluded to Iowa, I will give the opinion of a leading officer from that State, for not two weeks ago he told me that when there was a noise in camp the men said it was either a rabbit or General ROUSSEAU. He the defender of the soldiers of Iowa! Sir, they want no such defender; they want none of his defenses. He has not led them in the battle, and it is all pretense; it is the merest mockery; it is the merest trickery, the merest blowing of his own horn, for him to say that he led our soldiers. Where was the deadly hail when they were under his command? But he comes here to traduce a humble person like myself. In the first place, he charged me with saying what I never did say. When he went down to make a speech to the Fenians in New York he is reported to have said this: 'As I said on the floor of Congress on one occasion, as a firing was made at my native State by a pitiable politician from Iowa. [Hisses.] You will excuse me for giving his name, but I believe it was one Grinnell.'

"It was 'one Grinnell' that he alluded to. But I never made any firing at Kentucky. That is my name. I am so called and so known where I live. But that is not all. He was not content with using my name, but he refers to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [MR. STEVENS] in these terms: 'I say that man is a miscreant, and I cannot find words to express my disgust and contempt for him.' To whom does that relate? To a member of this House! And here he stands up, six feet and over, calling himself a buttoned-up general officer.

"MR. HARDING, of Illinois. Is this sort of debate in order?

"THE SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa had permission to make a personal explanation. If the gentleman raises the question as to personalities, the Chair will decide it.

"MR. ROUSSEAU. Shall I be held responsible for newspaper reports?

"THE SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question.

"MR. BANKS. I do not understand that in giving consent to the gentleman from Iowa, the House gave consent to him to make personal allusions, which are not justified by the rules of the House.

"THE SPEAKER. They do not; but it is the rule, as the gentleman well knows, having occupied the chair himself, that when leave is granted to a member to make a personal explanation, the Chair does not check personalities, but waits for some member to make the point of order.

"MR. BANKS. I understand the gentleman's privilege to be to state what he regards necessary to explain his own position.

"THE SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order on the gentleman from Iowa, the Chair will decide it.

"MR. BANKS. I do make the point of order.

"THE SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and decides that the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa are personal and out of order.

"MR. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, this is a painful exposition. But I am not responsible for it. When I make an assault I expect to receive an assault in return. I have never assaulted my equals and associates, and therefore I am not in the habit of receiving assaults in return. I have never risen here to question the integrity or doubt the veracity of any gentleman on this floor; and but for the fact that my personal integrity was assailed and that my words were misquoted I would not have risen here to-day. I have alluded to what was said in regard to me. The gentleman remarked that he did not care a fig about what I said; but when he goes and proclaims the matter in a great city, in the presence of thousands of people, I conclude that he does not rest altogether well satisfied under the well-proven charge of having declared that he would shoot an officer of the United States, on duty, under certain circumstances. And then the member whines off with a woman's plea, taking refuge under feminine skirts, as a certain other gentleman in rebellion went off in disguise.

"THE SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the remarks of the gentleman are out of order.

"MR. GRINNELL. I have nothing further to say."

In trying thus to defend himself, and repel the assault made upon him, he committed a most grave mistake for himself as an individual, and a most grave and unpardonable violation of the privileges of the House. In short, the gentleman from Iowa put himself precisely on the same plane with his assailant; and by mutual criminations and recriminations they both violated the rules and privileges of the House. Now, I will say that I do not accept the statement made a dozen times on the floor of the House, that the gentleman from Iowa charged the gentleman from Kentucky with cowardice. I do not so read the record. I affirm that he did not charge him with cowardice. I admit that the whole tone and temper of his remarks were in contempt of the military record of General ROUSSEAU, and in the highest degree offensive to him as a man of honor and of military reputation; but I deny that he charged him with cowardice.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I come to a point to which I desire for a moment the attention of the House—a point which has been made by four or five gentlemen who have spoken on this question—namely, the suggestion that General ROUSSEAU's offense is palliated by the fact that the House did not protect him, and therefore he was left to do as he said he would do, protect himself. I meet that by denying the allegation; I meet it by the statement that the House did protect him, that it gave him all the protection he or his friends asked for, and more than they asked for. In introducing this question of protection I desire to say a word concerning the action of the Speaker on that occasion. His course has been criticised by several gentlemen here; and I was surprised to hear my colleague, the chairman of the select committee, [MR. SPALDING,] express his dissatisfaction with the course of the Speaker on that occasion. His remarks are reported in the Globe as follows:

"In reply to the gentleman I say, that if I could find myself in a mood which would enable me, after the history of the gentleman from Kentucky in connection with the Army, to charge him with cowardice or anything like cowardice, I would deem myself worthy to be expelled from this House. I trust the gentleman is satisfied with my answer.

"Sir, with all due respect, I go further, and I say that this House looks at all times to its Presiding Officer to exercise a vigilant control over its proceedings. It depends upon his knowledge of parliamentary law, his experience, his discretion, his judicious use of that potent hammer which he holds in his hand. At the first word uttered by any member in disparagement of a fellow-member, that gavel should sound its reproof, and the member should be called to order. Of this I have no manner of doubt; and I say it with all due respect. I state this, although I know the Speaker has stated it is not the practice of the Chair to call to order when gentlemen have the privilege of the House to make personal explanations. I conceive it will be found to be correct parliamentary law that members of the House at all times are under the authority of the Speaker, and that it is his bounden duty to see that the utmost courtesy prevails among members. If that be not the parliamentary law, then we should take some action to make it so."

Now, sir, I desire to say that the course of the Speaker in matters of personal explanation is, in my judgment, the correct one, and the only one which, under the spirit and genius of our Government, can be or ought to be tolerated. In other Governments, as in France, for instance, the Speaker is, in some degree, the organ of the administration. He is understood to be not only a conservator of order generally, but particularly a defender of the administration; and whenever any gentleman upon the floor of the Corps Legislatif says anything that reflects upon the sovereign or upon any of the heads of departments the Speaker calls him down, and thus limits debate by his own notions of propriety. I ask the Clerk to read an extract I have cut from a paper, containing an account of what occurred in the French Legislature not many weeks ago, for the purpose of illustrating the difference between our practice and theirs.

The Clerk read as follows:

"FRENCH LIBERTY OF DEBATE.—In a debate in the French Legislature on the 16th ultimo, in regard to the system of conscription, a noteworthy passage occurred. The speaker, M. Glais-Bizoin, was urging an adoption of the policy of Prussia and Switzerland, of compelling only two or three years' military service. Said he:

"I am convinced that the illustrious author of the Idées Napoléoniennes has the same convictions now as when in exile.

"The PRESIDENT. M. Glais-Bizoin, be pleased to confine yourself to section one of the Ministry of War, without any digressions.

"M. GLAIS-BIZOIN. I am persuaded that the author of the Idées Napoléoniennes would not wish to expose himself to have such words applied to him as were addressed the other day by an eminent man to the Spanish minister in the Cortes: 'Your political disposition when in opposition is to speak only about progress and liberty, and when you are in power to treat as fools all those who believe in your words.'

"The PRESIDENT. M. Glais-Bizoin, I stop you and recall you to the question. It is your duty to respect the Emperor. [Great applause.] I beg you will return to the question, and not again depart from it. [Renewed applause.] If you go on I shall consult the Chamber to decide if it will allow you to continue speaking. [Exclamations.]

"M. JULES FAVRE. Then we may as well get our speeches prepared at the palace of the President.

"The PRESIDENT. I beg M. Jules Favre to explain his words, which I find very improper.

"M. JULES FAVRE. The explanation is simple enough. If every speaker were stopped in the expression of his thoughts it would be impossible to discuss anything.

"The PRESIDENT. The question is one of propriety, which should never be violated, and of which I am the guardian." [Applause.]

Mr. GARFIELD. And I also call attention to an article from a recent New York daily which contains many valuable suggestions on the subject under consideration:

"PARLIAMENTARY DECORUM.—Some of our contemporaries, who are not enamored of the legislation of this historic Congress, are quite profuse in their denunciations of it, and severely criticize its alleged lack of decorum. They point us, as the Herald, Atlas, and other presses have done, to the British Parliament and French Assembly as the models which Congress should imitate. Probably the following from the Pall Mall Gazette of June 2, which graphically describes a recent scene in the House of Commons, and which has not been rivaled of late years in the House of Representatives, illustrates the decorum they desire to have observed during our American discussions:

"The Asiatic gentlemen who last night visited the House of Commons witnessed a remarkable scene, which must have rather disturbed their previous conception of the 'collective wisdom' of a great country. For more than an hour, a large gathering of grave-looking gentlemen were engaged in hooting, howling, and groaning, while an excited little man was seen wagging a grey beard and gesticulating wildly, while every now and then—as the storm around him partially lulled—he was heard shouting disjointed fragments of sentences at the top of his voice. The oriental visitors probably learned, from their interpreter, that this was Mr. Whalley discoursing about Fenianism and the Pope, and must have been rather puzzled to know whether it was terror of the Irish or hatred of the Pope that caused such disorder.

"In the French Corps Législatif we often hear of equally boisterous scenes while a member is speaking. Hisses, exclamations, ejaculations, interruptions, the tinkling of the President's bell, which is used like a gavel for the preservation of order, and the President, finally despairing of quelling the chaos, declaring the session suspended till the tumult ceases. They are concerned, too—these criticizing presses—at the strictures uttered against those in authority, as if it were unprecedented. Have they forgotten Henry Clay's personal invectives against John Tyler? Are Douglas's bitter denunciations of Buchanan blotted from history? Were Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, and Franklin Pierce exempt from the severest personal censures? In a land like ours, where there is so much independence of thought, more freedom of discussion and severity of criticism are expected than in monarchical countries. And yet the legislators of Prussia have denounced their ministry quite as severely as our ministry have been denounced in Congress; and a personal allusion by one of the most gifted of England's orators to the Falstaffian form and falsifying characteristics of one of his parliamentary opponents, though biting in the extreme to its subject, passed unrebuked. In the French Corps Législatif the President watches the utterances of members, and, when a disparaging allusion is made to the Emperor, stops and scolds the offending member; and several of these stormy scenes have occurred there within the last year, and the description of them has been copied by the press of this city. In both branches of our Congress a different rule prevails. The presiding officer does not volunteer, with super-serviceable zeal, as in France, to check debaters in their utterances. They rule promptly when any member makes the point of order, but otherwise the freedom of debate is unchecked.

Perhaps this Congress compares unfavorably with those where pistols were drawn in the Senate Chamber, as in the days of Benton and Mississippi Foote, or when a Senator was brutally beaten in his seat for words spoken in debate, and for which he had not been even called to order; or when southern members crowded around Giddings' seat to silence his utterances, or when Lovejoy's speech provoked a mêlée and fight in the area in front of the Speaker's chair, or when Crawford, of Georgia, and others stood by the side of THADDEUS STEVENS and by personal threats sought to intimidate him. But, though there have been some personalities used which might better have been omitted, and though it has been harshly arraigned both by presidential and Cabinet speeches, we think this Congress will not suffer by comparison with any of its predecessors of the last quarter of a century."

Now, I wish to say that if the Speaker of this House were the organ of the Executive Government, set up over us to exercise his judgment about what was proper and what improper in all matters of debate, he would simply be the censor, critic, and judge of propriety in the House of Representatives, and might abridge freedom of debate as he should choose. On the contrary, he is the executive officer of the House, chosen by the House, bound by the rules of the House, and subject to its orders. I admit, as my colleague [Mr. SPALDING] suggests, that it is the duty of the Speaker to maintain general order and decorum in the House, yet every one knows that when a member rises to a personal explanation he must have unanimous consent, and the House, not the Speaker, gives the unanimous consent.

Mr. SPALDING. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. SPALDING. I would ask my colleague, if I rise in my seat to a personal explanation, and go on to say that my colleague from the nineteenth district [Mr. GARFIELD] is a liar, would it not be the duty of the Speaker to call me to order?

Mr. GARFIELD. I take it for granted it would be.

Mr. SPALDING. Would it not be his duty to call to order in all cases of personalities of that sort?

Mr. GARFIELD. I think not in all cases, for this reason: if any member should thus assail me in the course of debate, I take it that the Speaker might call him to order. But suppose the member had arisen and had asked and received unanimous consent of the House to make some personal remarks, and it was understood that personalities were expected when he asked such unanimous consent, then I take it for granted that while every member here would have a perfect right to call him to order the moment he used such disorderly words, still the custom which has prevailed and which is now established as the rule of the House would be observed, and the Speaker would wait for the House itself to indicate its wish in the case, for the House, and not the Speaker, gives the unanimous consent. If the House determines that he may proceed, the Speaker is overruled in the matter, and the highest authority has given its unanimous consent for personalities.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask my colleague whether the House is ever to be presumed to have given its consent, even by implication, that a member may proceed in a discourteous manner—in a personally offensive manner—to make his explanation.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly not; but I say that, according to the rules of proceeding in this House, any one of the one hundred and eighty-two members is authorized to call the disorderly member to order; and the failure of all the members to do it is an indication that the House is pleased to allow him to proceed.

My colleague [Mr. SPALDING] said yesterday that his blood chilled in his veins when he heard the language used by the gentleman from Iowa toward the gentleman from Kentucky. Why did he not then use his privilege as a member to stop it by simply raising the point of order and requiring the Speaker to decide it? After the gentleman from Iowa had gone to a certain length in his personalities he was called to order. He was stopped first by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARDING,] and again by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] and the point of order was promptly sustained by the Speaker. After the gentleman from Iowa had thus been twice called to order, the Speaker announced his determination to call him to order himself, if he should again violate the rules by personalities; and subsequently, in pursuance of that notification, the Speaker did call him to order.

Now, I say that in the three instances named, the gentleman from Kentucky was protected by the House. But, it is said, the gentleman from Iowa was not required to take his seat, and the offensive words were not taken down. Whose fault was it? Why, the gentleman from Kentucky himself could have demanded it. He had his remedy. Any one of his friends could have demanded it. They all had their remedy. They saw fit to go no further than simply to call the gentleman from Iowa to order; and the call was promptly responded to by the Speaker. I say, then, that the gentleman from Kentucky had all the protection that the gentleman from Illinois asked for him, all that the gentleman from Massachusetts asked for him, all that the Speaker asked for him, and all that he asked for himself. If he desired any more protection, he ought to have asked for more. He certainly has no ground of complaint against the Speaker, who ruled in his favor on every appeal, notwithstanding the gentleman had, in violation of parliamentary law, alluded to the Speaker by name seventeen times in the first ten minutes of his speech of June 11, and had made two offensive and uncalled-for flings at the Speaker's visit to Utah and the Mormons.

Mr. DAWES. After the statements which the gentleman has made, I desire to ask him, by what authority have we then the right to arraign the gentleman from Iowa a second time? If he was arraigned by the House for a transgression of the rules and the House passed on the question, why should we pass upon it again?

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, that question has been so fully, clearly, and ably discussed in the decision of the Chair that I need not go into it. But I will make this statement: if the words of the gentleman from Iowa had not been objected to, then his language could not be called in question now. But his words were objected to by two members as well as by the Speaker. The words having been objected to before other business intervened, the case does not come within the rule which exempts the member from liability to be called to account for them.

I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts how it was that after half an hour of angry debate had passed the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBURD] rose in his place and moved that certain charges which had been made and certain words which had been uttered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] against the gentleman's colleague [Mr. CONKLING] should be investigated. Under that motion a committee was appointed; and that committee, after a tedious investigation, have reported to this House a resolution of censure.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will allow me, I will explain the difference between the two cases. The gentleman from New York proposed to investigate charges which had been made against a member of the House, not to arraign the gentleman from Maine for having transgressed the rules of the House. My idea of this matter is that, as the words were excepted to, the gentleman uttering them is arraigned. In pursuance of that exception, and in no other way, can the gentleman from Iowa be tried. He was arraigned by the exception, and we tried him to the extent which we then thought the offense deserved—whether sufficiently or not I do not care to discuss. But then we passed judgment, and in my opinion we are not at liberty now, when upon reflection we are of opinion that we ought to have passed a different judgment, to arraign him a second time.

Mr. FINCK. I rise to a question of order. I understand this question was made the other day and disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has resumed the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. The occasion for my colleague's point of order is past now. I hold that the gentleman from Kentucky had his remedy perfectly at his command, and that every time protection was asked for it was given to the full extent demanded. And not only so, but after the gentleman from Iowa had concluded his personality the gentleman from Kentucky then took the floor and proposed to repel the assault in kind, that is, to answer words by words, and did so. And I will here remark, though I did not hear the discussion myself, that it appears to be the general opinion of members who did hear it, that the gentleman from Kentucky bore himself with more dignity and propriety at the conclusion than his adversary did. I make that remark for the purpose of showing that he came out of that encounter better than he went in. He began as the assailant, but he concluded with a degree of dignity which partly covered the offensive matter and manner of his opening speech. Having come out of the encounter with some dignity and relative credit, he concluded his remarks on that occasion with these words:

"I hope now that I have heard the last of the member from Iowa. I hope I shall never have occasion to recur to the subject again. Whatever glory he has gained in this contest I am content he should wear."

Thus, Mr. President, the books were again balanced. As the war of words in February closed with about equal fortune and the books were then balanced, so, as the collision of June 11 was concluded, the books were again balanced; the gentleman from Kentucky declared himself satisfied with the part he had taken in the transaction and said the matter had ended.

Now, I hold that on every ground of honorable contest the matter was then ended. If cowardice had been charged upon one side, falsehood, which is worse, had been charged upon the other. If a slur had been cast upon the military fame of one, the deepest stain had been imputed to the manhood of the other, and after these mutual criminations and recriminations the books had been balanced and peace was declared. If anything happened after that it happened by virtue of a new assault, an assault that must stand alone by itself.

And now let us consider this assault. Gentlemen are familiar with all the details of it. I call attention for a moment to the spirit manifested by the gentleman from Kentucky on the trial before the committee. Instead of desiring to palliate his offense, instead of manifesting any purpose to explain or to apologize to the committee or the member that he had beaten, it is plainly evident on every page of the testimony that the member from Kentucky was proud of having committed the offense and wished to make it appear that it was done courageously and promptly, and that he did not even wait for an explanation. Let me read a few passages from the record of the cross-examination of Mr. GRINKELL by Mr. ROUSSEAU:

"Question. I want to ask you again to state whether I did not strike you over the shoulders with the rattan on the instant you uttered words declining an apology, whatever they were.

Answer. I said very soon. I would not say on the instant. I think you swore a good deal before you struck me.

"Question. Did not I strike you before swearing any?"

Answer. I think not.

"Question. Are you positive about that?"

Answer. I think I am.

"Question. Was not the swearing and the striking done simultaneously?"

Answer. I should say you swore first.

"Question. Did you put your hand on me until that rattan was about worn out?"

Answer. I think I caught you when you commenced.

"Question. I beg you to be sure about that matter. I ask you to bring it again to your recollection."

He wants the gentleman from Iowa to be certain that he thrashed him before any word was spoken, and to make it appear that he came to thrash him and for nothing else. He wants the committee to understand that thrashing was the business he came for, and not to ask for an apology, that he did not expect any apology, but came there to assault and disgrace a member of this House for words spoken in debate. Four times in the cross-examination of the gentleman from Iowa the gentleman from Kentucky seeks in that way to make it appear that he fought the member from Iowa as quickly as he could possibly get at him, without waiting for any kind of ceremony. That is the spirit displayed by the gentleman from Kentucky in this case. When he is called to the stand as a witness, in the same spirit he goes out of his way to put this question to the member from Iowa:

"Question. I wish to put the question to you distinctly, so as to introduce proof on that subject. I ask you again if, when I spoke to you about an apology, and you said something declining it, whether I did not instantly begin with the rattan and wear it out, and whether every blow I struck was not struck before you put your hands on me; and when you took hold of my arm did I not take you by the throat and thrust you up against a column; and did not you then remark to me, 'I do not want to hurt you,' and did not say, 'You are very kind,' or words to that effect?"

And when by-and-by the committee seemed to be in doubt whether they should decide that these things were done because of words spoken in debate, the gentleman says, "Certainly they were." He hastens to assure us that the whole thing was a matter of deliberate purpose and premeditation. He does not seek to palliate his offense. He makes no apology. It is only the amiable gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] and his other kind-hearted friends who come before us and beg us to be lenient. The member from Kentucky gives us no ground whatever for leniency.

Now, what was this assault made for? He declares it was for the purpose of disgracing a member of the House. Was it also for the purpose of proving his courage? Mr. Speaker, if I did not happen to know of the former gallantry and courage of the gentleman from Kentucky, this assault would have proved to me that he was totally destitute of manly courage, especially when we consider the comparative physical proportions of the two gentlemen. There might have been some proof of courage if the gentleman from Iowa had assaulted the gentleman from Kentucky; but on the other side, none. There must be other proof of the courage of the gentleman from Kentucky than that. He should have assaulted a person more muscular and powerful than the gentleman from Iowa if he wished to prove his courage. His courage was already established, and I regret that he thought it necessary to reestablish it in such a way.

Mr. Speaker, I should have said nothing on this subject but for one reason. The military record of the gentleman has been referred to as a reason why the House should look leniently on his offense. Sir, let it once be decided that because a man has been in the Army he may therefore violate the personal privileges of members of the House, and there are quite a number of gentlemen on this floor who would be interested in that decision. If the military members of this House desire to have their military histories spread upon public records, and their military achievements rehearsed with all the decorations of oratory, it will only be necessary for them to get up a collision with some member that can safely be flogged, and their neglected military exploits will adorn the columns of the Globe and be scattered throughout the country. But, sir, as one of those who served in the field I utterly repudiate any such claim of impunity, and I ask gentlemen to judge me and my acts by the same rule that they judge any other member of the House. We are peers on this floor. It makes no difference whether I came here from the highest walks of military life, from the plow-tail, the work-bench, or the school-house, I am officially the peer of every member on this floor.

And I ask, Mr. Speaker, what will be the effect of allowing this offense to pass lightly by? I was sorry that the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] saw fit to refer to the long catalogue of barbarisms practiced in this House, and then to ask in apparent exultation, "Which one of those was expelled? Not one, not even Preston S. Brooks for his assault on Mr. SUMNER." Why was he not expelled? It was because there were enough bullies in the House to keep Mr. Brooks in his seat. But now, when a new era has dawned, when a new chapter is opened in our history, I beg members of this House to write down some bold, brave words that shall declare that here men stand upon their rights and not upon their muscle; that no longer the barbarism of bludgeons or the arguments of clubs are to be used, but the reason and judgment of men. Suppose you retain the member from Kentucky in his seat; he may have presents of canes and rattans; he may be fêted and toasted for his barbarous offense against the dignity of this House. I beg this House to set the seal of its condemnation upon his act.

Sir, look to the effect of his example. Even since I began this speech, a brutal assault has been committed in this building, in the corridors below where I stand, upon the person of the clerk of a committee of this House, and he is now weltering in his blood, his life despaired of. That clerk may die of the injuries a bully has inflicted upon him since I commenced these remarks, and if you decree that the act of the member from Kentucky shall go without rebuke, then you may as well notify all the smaller men here to arm themselves with pistols hereafter. Sir, if fighting is to be the rule, if that is what we are to expect, then let us know it that we may be prepared for it.

Sir, I shall vote for the resolution of expulsion as it has been reported from the committee without change or alteration, and I trust that this House will have the moral courage to pass it by a vote so nearly unanimous that no man shall ever hereafter hope to gain any glory by becoming a bully, and flogging members whenever he may not be satisfied with what has been said in debate.

ASSAULT ON A COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. ALLEY. I wish to say, in connection with the allusion just made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD], that a most brutal and unprovoked outrage has just been committed upon an officer of this House, and I therefore desire to submit for the consideration and action of this House, at this time, the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That whereas a violent personal assault has been committed upon the person of U. H. Painter, the clerk of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, by two persons now in the custody of the police officers of the Capitol, the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby directed to take into his custody the assailants, and to detain them until the further orders of the House upon the subject.

Mr. STEVENS. I beg leave to suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] that he better name the persons in his resolution, for we can hardly issue a general order of arrest.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. They are in custody now.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, they had better be named in the resolution.

Mr. KELLEY. One of them is named Benjamin B. Beveridge.

Mr. ALLEY. The other is named Edward Towers. I modify my resolution so as to insert the names of Benjamin B. Beveridge and Edward Towers.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I would ask if these parties are not already in the custody of the officers of the law, and is not the law amply sufficient to provide for their punishment. And if they are brought here can we inflict a punishment adequate to the offense which has been committed?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. We will see about that.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I do not know that we have any authority to punish these men, or to keep them in custody longer than this session of Congress, which may terminate in a very few days. Why should we, by the adoption of this resolution, take these persons from the custody of the laws of the country passed by this Congress for the protection of the citizens of this District and bring them here to be tried at the bar of this House? I merely make this suggestion to the gentleman. At the same time I do not desire to screen these persons; I do not know anything of them.

Mr. WRIGHT. What evidence have we of the facts mentioned in this resolution?

Mr. TRIMBLE. I do not know.

Mr. ALLEY. I modify my resolution so that it will read as follows:

Resolved, That whereas a violent personal assault has been committed upon the person of U. H. Painter, the clerk of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, by Benjamin B. Beveridge and Edward Towers, who are now in the custody of the police officers of the Capitol the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby directed to take into his custody the assailants, and to detain them until the further orders of the House upon the subject; and that a select committee of five members be appointed by the Speaker, whose duty it shall be to examine into and report the facts in the case, with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Would it not be well for us to let the ordinary civil authorities first take cognizance of this transaction? We can interfere afterward, if it should be necessary.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, the point is raised that this is not a question of privilege. The Chair rules that it is a question of privilege, which may properly receive the action of the House. This House has even gone so far as to bring citizens before the bar for disorder in the galleries. If this could be done, then unquestionably when an officer of the House has been beaten or assailed within the walls of the Capitol the House has power to take action in the matter. It is a question for the House to determine whether it will exercise this power in the present case or permit it to go before the courts, as suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. TRIMBLE.]

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced the appointment of Messrs. ALLEY, FARNSWORTH, TRIMBLE, J. L. THOMAS, and LARLIN to constitute the select committee provided for in the resolution.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced to the House that the Senate had passed House bill No. 3, to revive the grade of General in the United States Army, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 218, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 213) "making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 62, 113, 116, 117, 122, 123, 136, 137, 139, and 145, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their one hundred and eighteenth, one hundred and thirty-first, one hundred and thirty-second, one hundred and thirty-third, and one hundred and thirty-fourth amendments.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and fortieth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all of said Senate amendment, being section six, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the female clerks and counters employed in the several Departments and bureaus, whose appointments are made by the several heads of Departments, under the provisions of law, and whose legal compensation has heretofore amounted to $720 each per annum, and the female clerks employed at the Post Office Department, shall, from and after the 30th day of June, 1866, receive in lieu of all other compensation an annual salary of $900 each per annum; and the amount necessary to pay the increased salaries herein provided for, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and forty-fourth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In line nine of said amendment, strike out all after the words "authorized to," down to and including the word "due," in line ten, and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "make said adjustment;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the eighty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate agree to so much of the amendment of the House to the one hundred and twenty-fourth amendment of the Senate as is embraced in the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and to and including the word "dollars," in the sixth line of said House amendment; and disagree to the balance of said amendment, and the House agree to the same as so modified.

That the House recede from their amendment to the thirtieth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the sixty-first amendment of the Senate, and to their amendment of the same, and agree to the said Senate amendment with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all of said Senate amendment after the word "services," in line five, and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "Provided further, That so much of the appropriation of $250,000 granted by act approved March 2, 1865, for compensation to temporary clerks in the Treasury Department and for additional compensation to clerks in the same Department as remains unexpended, shall be divided as follows, namely: $100 each shall be paid to the clerks in said Department of the first and second classes who have not received any additional compensation out of said appropriation, and who shall have served in said capacity for one year previously to July 1, 1865; and $100 shall be paid to each person employed in said Department appointed by the Secretary, at an annual salary amounting to less than $1,200, and who shall have served under such appointment for one year previous to July 1, 1865; and if the balance of said appropriation remaining unexpended shall be insufficient to pay said clerks and appointees the sum of $100 each as herein provided, the deficiency shall be supplied and paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and forty-second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: in line five of said amendment insert the following words: "who shall be the draughtsman;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. MORRILL. This bill, as now reported by the committee of conference, embraces one provision which will be in conflict with a bill about to be reported from the Committee of Ways and Means in relation to the pay of the female clerks. I observe that it is proposed to increase the pay of all these clerks from $720 to $900 per annum. The bill which the committee propose to report provides for the classification of these clerks as other clerks are classified. It is found, on inquiry at the Department, that there is quite as much propriety and justice in having these clerkships divided into different grades with different rates of pay as there is in classifying the male clerks.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to the gentleman from Vermont that if the bill to which he refers should hereafter be passed it will repeal this provision. I understand that it proposes to reorganize the whole Department. The gentleman must be aware that if we allow the female clerks to be classified, the handsomest ones will receive the highest promotion. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL. Some of these female clerks do thrice the amount of work performed by others; and there is no propriety in all receiving the same amount of pay. There are female clerks who do as much work as many of the males.

Mr. STEVENS. We can discuss this question when the bill to which the gentleman refers shall come before us. There is no reason why we should not adopt the report of the committee of conference.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASSAULT ON A MEMBER—AGAIN.

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour in the discussion upon this question I do not think it desirable to indulge in many remarks. There are, however, one or two points which have not to my mind been satisfactorily presented to the House; and it is mainly to them that I wish to direct the few remarks that I have to make. Much has been said in reference to the assault made in debate here by the member from Iowa upon the member from Kentucky. In reference to that, I must believe that the member from Iowa really did not intend anything derogatory to the member from Kentucky. The latter gentleman, however, understood it differently, and, so understanding it, recognized his right to vindicate himself.

It must be borne in mind that the remarks of the member from Iowa were imprinted upon the public records of the country; they were placed in the Globe, to go down to all posterity; and his assault upon an honorable gentleman who has proved his courage and vindicated the honor of his country upon the battlefield thus passed down to posterity. There it stands forever as a record against him. Sir, this demanded something more than a mere retraction; yet the retraction itself did not go upon the record as the assault did. The gentleman assailed had made various efforts to induce the House to protect him against this assault, and the House had failed to do it. The words were then upon the record, to live forever and forever, and he sought what he conceived to be the only possible chance of vindicating himself. He had notified the House that he would do it. He had told the House while these offensive remarks were being made that if the House failed to protect him he would be compelled to protect himself; and he sought that protection. The House was well advised of the fact that he meant to vindicate himself, for after once so stating he went forward to where the gentleman from Iowa was delivering his speech, and standing near him reiterated the statement, "If the House will not protect me, I must protect myself, and I am able to do it." That was fair warning; and yet the gentleman from Iowa was permitted to proceed. I recognize the position assumed by the Speaker in regard to this matter as a correct one, namely, that permission having been given to the gentleman from Iowa to make a personal explanation, the Speaker had no right to interfere, unless his attention was called to the remarks of the member from Iowa by some member of the House; but, after the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] had interfered, the gentleman from Iowa still went on, and it was not so much the words he used, as the manner of using them, that was disrespectful to the member from Kentucky.

Now, the gentleman from Kentucky, having notified the House of his intention to protect himself, and still not receiving due protection from the House, what else could he do? What other course was left open to him than the one he pursued? Following the bent of his own judgment, and not having received the apology that would vindicate him before the country on this record, he went out of doors to correct the wrong and maintain the position that he had occupied as a man of courage and determination. As this branch of the subject has been elaborately discussed, I am unwilling at this late hour of the day to elaborate it further. I will simply call the attention of the House to an extraneous matter connected with this transaction which has been brought in here by the report of the committee for the action of the House. Here are three gentlemen who are implicated in this assault by the committee, and who may be brought to the bar of the House for punishment or rebuke.

Now, as an individual member of the committee I maintained, throughout its session, that we had nothing to do with these gentlemen, and I wish to present my views on that point to the House. These three gentlemen were brought before the committee as witnesses. They were summoned and compelled to obey its mandate, and when there were examined in reference to the character of this assault. They had no notice that there was any charge against them, and had no opportunity to defend themselves; and yet now they find themselves suddenly charged with a breach of the privileges of the House, and ordered to be brought to the bar of the House to receive its censure. Why does the Constitution of our country provide that no man shall be required to criminate himself in giving testimony? Do not all our criminal proceedings proceed upon the idea that a man's word, when upon the witness stand, shall not implicate him? And yet these gentlemen are to be brought to the bar here to answer for a high crime without notice, and simply because their own words upon the witness stand have been used for their own condemnation and judgment? Sir, we have had the Constitution elaborately elucidated during the progress of the discussion in this case; and I would like now some constitutional lawyer to tell me what right there is in this House to bring these gentlemen to this bar for what they did in the premises.

Let us see what were the facts in reference to these three gentlemen. It is alleged that there were some fifteen or twenty persons on the portico of the Capitol at the time this assault was made, and of those only these three are called to account. It is alleged that one of these was there as the personal friend of General ROUSSEAU, and he admitted that he was there as a friend of long standing. What for? Because General ROUSSEAU had intimated to him that he was going to commit an assault on Mr. GRINNELL some time, and probably that day; and it was for the purpose of seeing that there was justice and right and fairness in the contest between these assailants that he was there.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is no testimony to that effect.

Mr. HOGAN. Yes, that is in the testimony. Colonel Pennybaker swears that he came up here at the request of General ROUSSEAU, who had informed him that he had intended to make this attack upon Mr. GRINNELL, but had not told him at what time, in what place, or under what circumstances. He followed General ROUSSEAU from this Hall into the rotunda, and thence out upon the portico, and was present during the assault as ROUSSEAU's friend. He says he did not intend to interfere in the matter at all unless outsiders had attempted to disturb either of the parties, in which case he would have interfered to protect them.

But it is said that he had a deadly weapon with him; that he had a pistol in his pocket. So he had, but he explained explicitly that he did not intend to use it under any circumstances unless he himself were personally assailed in protecting these parties from interference by outsiders. These other two gentlemen were there also, and it is said that each of them had a pistol.

In reference to Colonel Grigsby, the testimony is that he knew nothing at all about this matter—that he had no conception that anything of the kind was going to take place, and that he did not come here at the request of ROUSSEAU or Pennybaker. He came to the House to see his Representative, and then, not knowing that anything particular was about to happen, followed Pennybaker out on the portico. How, then, is he implicated as a particeps criminis in this matter? It is said he had a pistol; and that the fact of his having a pistol with him is prima facie evidence that he intended to commit a deadly assault upon somebody. He carried a little pistol in his pocket, a little Deringer pistol. He said that it was about "that long," taking his finger and measuring upon it. It was about a finger long, and had probably not been out of his pocket for a year.

Mr. O'NEILL. It was long enough to have a ball in it, I suppose.

Mr. HOGAN. Of course it had a ball in it, and the probability is that it had powder in it, too, for the one generally follows the other. But so he was, with that deadly weapon. I heard a gentleman say in reference to such an instrument that if he was paid a certain amount for shot he would agree to stand fifty feet off and allow a person to shoot at him all day long with such a pistol. I would not like to do it myself, because I have a deadly antipathy to all such things, and have never carried one in my life.

Mr. KELLEY. Did the gentleman ever hear any one say he would be willing to stand off six feet and be fired at all day long with such a pistol?

Mr. HOGAN. That I did not hear said. But I think it was altogether dependent upon circumstances whether the pistol was to be fired at all. Colonel Grigsby said that he did not intend to use it on that occasion; he had it there, and if anybody had assailed him personally for trying to preserve the rights between the parties, then only would he probably have used it.

The other gentleman who was there, and who is implicated, did not know anything about the intended assault, did not come here, and did not go there because of any knowledge that he had upon the subject. But having some days before made some kind of arrangement with Mr. ROUSSEAU, to go with him to New York, he had passed out into the rotunda before him. Mr. ROUSSEAU passed by him suddenly; he spoke to him, but Mr. ROUSSEAU did not notice what he said. Not knowing whether he was sick, or what was the matter with him, he followed him out of the door. And that was all his connection with the matter.

Two of these gentlemen state explicitly that only in case there was interference with the contending parties by outsiders, only in case outsiders interfered with either of them, they did not care which, would they have taken part in the fray, and neither of them would have used their pistols under any circumstances, unless they themselves had been assailed for the prevention of anybody from interfering with either of the contending parties. Now, why should those three gentlemen be singled out and brought here to the bar of the House by a resolution of this committee, in order to answer for such a crime as this? Why should they be brought here upon their own sole testimony, constrained and forced testimony, being brought before that committee to testify in reference to the facts, and by thus testifying, being made to implicate themselves as having deadly weapons upon their persons, weapons which they were in the habit of carrying, which they usually carried? One of them said his pistol had not been out of his pocket that he knew of for a year. And the other said that he did not know when he had been without his, unless by mere accident when he was changing his clothes he failed to take his pistol out of his pocket and left it at home.

Now, I contend we have no right to implicate these gentlemen at all; we have no right at all to bring them up here. They ought not to have been included at all in the report of the committee, other than as having given testimony before the committee. Why did not the committee include in their report Senator SAULSBURY, who was there by accident? Why did not they include ten or twenty other persons, as the case may be, who were present? But they were not known. If they had known them and had brought them before the committee, they might have made them implicate themselves and then have brought them before the bar of the House; and thus have everybody who, by the merest accident in the world, happened to be in the rotunda that day gain an immortality in this country through the report of this committee, which is to be placed upon the records of this House, to stand there as long as our Republic shall endure. Sir, I think it is not right to bring these gentlemen into a false and unfortunate position; to bring them here as though they were personally implicated in this matter; to bring them here against their will, without their knowledge, and condemn them without a hearing.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether he has entirely forgotten that he signed the minority report in this case, and that as a member of the minority he declared that he fully concurred in the very resolution which he now condemns, the resolution requiring that these persons who were accessories to the assault shall be brought to the bar of this House.

Mr. HOGAN. My colleague on the committee will recollect very distinctly that during the whole progress of the debate which arose upon this point I took a position analogous to that which I take now. I did not feel disposed to make a minority report for myself alone upon this, which I regarded as an incidental point. I was opposed to the action which the committee took and so stated, giving notice that I should take the same ground in the House. I agreed generally to the report of the committee. I generally prefer to agree to the report of a committee. When I cannot get all I want, I take all I can get. But, when this question was before the committee, I took decided grounds against this resolution; and I take the same position now. I ask members of the House to point me to any legal principle, or to any provision of the Constitution which will authorize us to bring these gentlemen before our bar for trial, much less for censure and condemnation. I do not find any such authority in the general law of the country, or in the rules and usages of this House, or in the Constitution, which is supreme over all.

Mr. SPALDING. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] is now entitled to an hour in which to close the debate.

Mr. SPALDING. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy any time in the general discussion of this question. I have nothing to say in regard to the character either of the gentleman from Iowa, with whom I am well acquainted, or the gentleman from Kentucky, of whom I know nothing; and even were it otherwise, it is best that I should say nothing of the latter gentleman lest what I might say should be considered as provoked by some unkind remarks which he is reported to have made with regard to me, which under such circumstances I never answer.

But, sir, I cannot help thinking that there is some irregularity in the trial of the gentleman from Iowa which is now going on; for I consider it nothing else than a trial of that gentleman—a trial upon charges never made and never referred to the committee. This proceeding has given occasion here and there for eulogy upon the distinguished and gallant gentleman from Kentucky. Any one listening to many parts of this debate might suppose that this whole matter had been gotten up for the purpose of glorifying the military career and genius of that gentleman, which I have no disposition to question. After the eloquent, high-flown eulogies of the chairman of the committee [Mr. SPALDING] and the amiable gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] I would as soon think of doubting the military history of Marlborough or Bonaparte or Washington or Grant as to doubt the distinguished military position of the gentleman from Kentucky. Whatever may be the action of this House, history will award him a full compensation in the glory which he will have acquired with posterity. Future generations will overlook the fact that the issue now before the House grew out of a ruffianly attack by that gentleman, with three ruffian associates, upon an unarmed man, engaged at the time in the discharge of his duty.

I shall not touch these things nor say one word about them. What I rose for was to sustain my resolution, my substitute, and I do it for the purpose of purifying the record of this House of what I deem to be a greater infringement of the privileges of this body than even the assault of the gentleman from Kentucky. I mean the report of the committee. Now, sir, what was referred to that committee? The preamble is in these words:

"Whereas it is alleged in the public press that Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, a member of this House from the State of Kentucky, did, on the evening of Thursday, the 14th instant, commit an assault upon the person of Hon. J. B. GRINNELL, a member of this House from Iowa, because of words spoken in debate in this House by the latter; and whereas said assault, if committed, was a breach of the privileges of this House and of the member assaulted."

Undoubtedly, as the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWWELL] has well said, there is no more power in this House to go beyond that preamble than to bring in a bill of indictment against any member of this House for words spoken last year, and every act beyond the investigation of that charge was extra-official, from which this House should purge itself if ever it means to take care of its own privileges and guard its members in future from the reports of majorities that may be passed upon them.

After that preamble comes the resolution:

"Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the subject and to report the facts."

What subject? The subject referred to and recited. There is no other subject and no other fact referred to the committee upon which they could, within the fair discharge of their duty, have reported to this House. Otherwise such a committee may travel over the conduct of every member of this body and every person outside of the House, select men at discretion and bring them to the bar of the House for punishment. Sir, I look at this as a most alarming state of things. I make these remarks knowing the high legal and moral character of the gentlemen that compose the committee, and the honesty with which I know they have made this report. My friend from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] very irregularly, as I think, brought this matter to the decision of the Chair. I think the Chair has nothing to do with it, although I know there are precedents of that kind. If there had been a resolution offered in this House to investigate the conduct of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] for words spoken two weeks ago, then the question of order would have been raised and properly submitted to the Chair and decided by him. But that time was past. The resolution contained no such order, so that there is nothing for the Speaker to decide.

I will now, therefore, proceed as though this had not been decided by the ingenious Speaker, and I will discuss for a few minutes the propositions which I have stated for the purpose of enforcing the necessity of adopting my amendment, to expunge everything but the single question with regard to the gentleman from Kentucky, in order that the record may not stand to future Houses as a precedent for their action.

The sixth section of the Constitution, as already cited, speaking of the privileges of the House of Representatives, says that for any speech or debate in either House members shall not be questioned in any other place. That seems to be very explicit. To be sure there have been very ingenious suggestions that knocking a man down or stabbing him is not questioning him, and that all this constitutional provision means is, that if you meet a man out of doors who has made a speech here you shall not ask him the question whether he made it, but you may cut his throat or do anything of that kind. I do not look upon this argument as worth answering. It is clear that whatever is spoken in this House must be answered in this House and nowhere else.

Otherwise the constitutional provision is not worth a straw.

The only question then is as to the time in which a member shall be questioned for words spoken in debate. Now, sir, the sixty-first rule of this House, passed long ago, is in these words:

"If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate; if there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to. If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, he shall not be permitted to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House; and if the case require it, he shall be liable to the censure of the House."

As the rule then stood it was loose. It was decided that it required no taking down or verifying of the words in writing, and there was no limit as to the time when the member might be censured, and it was to correct that evil that the sixty-second rule was adopted in these words:

"If a member be called to order for words spoken in debate, the person calling him to order shall repeat the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's table; and no member shall be held to answer, or be subject to the censure of the House, for words spoken in debate, if any other member has spoken, or other business has intervened, after the words spoken, and before exception to them shall have been taken."

Now, sir, if there be anything in the English language which is explicit to remedy the evil to which I have referred it is that. Calling to order does not mean getting up and saying "I object." Calling to order legitimately involves the taking down of the words at the desk and recording them. And then it is followed by a most explicit declaration that unless that be done, and unless the words be then excepted to, nothing is plainer in the English language than that never afterward shall those words be called in question or the member censured therefor.

Now, the ingenious argument is, that that rule consists of two parts. Why, every lawyer knows that when there is a sentence in pari materia, all on one subject, it is all to be taken and construed together as one sentence. I do not care about your colons and semicolons. Statutes are all printed in solid line without marks of punctuation. These are mere questions of the printer.

It is clear, then, as the sun in heaven that unless an exception be taken at the time no censure shall ever be inflicted upon the member. And let it not be said by any well-trained man that what you mean there by "exception" can be words heard and gathered by the ear or in any loose manner. The law fixes it that they must be words taken down at the desk. Whoever attempts to censure a member for words spoken in debate, if they are not taken down at the desk at the time you proceed to judgment, if anything else is done, has mistaken the privileges of this House and the great rights which are guaranteed by the careful rules of this body.

Mr. SPALDING. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER.]

Mr. STEVENS. One single word, with the permission of my colleague. So far as the third resolution with regard to the men who happened to be present instinctively armed, I hold that this committee has no power or jurisdiction over them, and that the resolution condemning them without being summoned before this House, is an outrage upon them as much as the resolution in regard to the gentleman from Iowa is an outrage upon him.

Mr. THAYER. It was not my intention to trouble the House with any remarks, but to have contented myself with the simple duty which I have already discharged as a member of the committee. But the general course of the debate, and particularly the remarks which have fallen from some gentlemen who have engaged in this discussion, seem to call for some reply upon the part of gentlemen upon whom was imposed the unpleasant duty of being on this committee. Perhaps, sir, that committee, in view of the criticism of my learned colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] ought to congratulate themselves if, when this question is finally decided, everybody does not escape except the committee. They should perhaps congratulate themselves if they escape censure; while everybody approximately and remotely concerned in this invasion of the privileges of Congress goes unwhipped of justice.

My colleague, with that moderation of language with which we know he is accustomed to characterize measures which do not seem to square precisely with his own prejudiced views, told the House, in so many words, that the proposition made by the committee would be an infraction of the privileges of the House greater than that which was inflicted by the gentleman from Kentucky upon the gentleman from Iowa. Sir, I have great respect for my colleague; I have great respect for many of his opinions; and certainly the very greatest respect for him personally, and I know I shall never be betrayed by anything which my colleague may say into saying anything which can be construed as disrespectful to him.

But, sir, as a member of this committee I am not quite content with the allegation of my colleague. I beg the House to look at "the monstrous proposition" which is held up here by my colleague for their condemnation. This committee had imposed upon them a most unpleasant duty. They were instructed by this House to inquire into the circumstances of an assault committed in consequence of words used in debate. Now, my colleague, in his cunning and artful plea of the statute of limitations, which he has put in here in behalf of the gentleman from Iowa, seems to think that there is nothing in the resolution of instructions to the committee but the part upon which he chose to comment in the hearing of this House. Sir, the committee were instructed to inquire into the circumstances of the assault and whether it was made in consequence of words uttered in debate in this House. And because this committee have inquired into that fact, and whether the assault was in consequence of words uttered in debate; and because in pursuance of the instructions of this House the committee have reported to this House what action ought to be taken under these circumstances, their report is characterized as a greater infraction of the privileges of this House than the assault of the gentleman from Kentucky on the member from Iowa.

Mr. STEVENS. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. THAYER. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish merely to have my views properly understood. I hold that the committee had a right to inquire whether the assault was made in consequence of words spoken in debate. But when they had gone thus far they had no right to inquire what those words were, or anything else about it, for they were no palliation of the offense, and they could not react upon other parties.

Mr. THAYER. I do not object, I have no right to object to any opinions which my colleague may choose to hold upon that subject. It may be that the committee have transcended their jurisdiction. I do not profess to be as clear-sighted, and I certainly have had none of the vast experience of my colleague. I only undertake to justify the action of the committee according to my own views of the case, and to vindicate myself, as a member of that committee, from the language which is applied to their report by my colleague from the Lancaster district, [Mr. STEVENS.]

My colleague also finds great fault with the committee for having ventured to propose the third of this series of resolutions. On former occasions I have heard much from my colleague of the brutality which characterized a certain period of the parliamentary history of this country. I have heard him speak of "Barksdale's gleaming blade," and of many other things described in similarly well-rounded and astounding periods by my colleague. And it is with some astonishment, allow me to say to my colleague, that I find him, on the very first occasion when it is within his power to put the strong hand of the law upon the violence which I have heard him so often denounce, now denying the very jurisdiction of the House over offenders who have aided and abetted in a personal assault upon a member of this House for words spoken in debate. Why, sir, this is dwindling—I say it with great respect to this House—this is dwindling into a most insignificant farce. Either the privileges of this House have been violated, or they have not. If they have been violated, you are bound out of respect for your own dignity, and for the preservation of the privileges of the body to which you temporarily belong, to punish that violation of its privileges. If those privileges have not been violated, then you have no right to impose any punishment upon anybody.

But to propose, as is now proposed, that in view of an attempted violation of the most aggravated character, in view of an assault upon the person of a member of this House, of blows given and blood drawn—I say to propose to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, that they are to vindicate the privileges of this House by simply saying to the member who has committed that breach of privilege, "Sir, pray consider yourself reprimanded," is to say that which the people of the country will laugh at. So far from maintaining the self-respect of the House of Representatives, so far from vindicating its outraged privileges, I maintain that by such a vote as that you would but encourage disorder and brutality.

But before I say anything more upon that subject, let me make a single remark upon the action of the committee in regard to the member from Iowa. I am sorry that this question should have been discussed as if it were a case of cross-actions between individuals, in which both parties were claiming to recover damages from each other.

Sir, I supposed that this question was to be discussed and treated as a question of privilege; and I did suppose that members, in discussing and voting upon questions of privilege, would dismiss from view all personal considerations, all personal friendships, and do what justice and their own self-respect might demand. But, sir, this subject had hardly been mooted before an objection was raised in the nature of a plea of the statute of limitations, put in by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] in behalf of his colleague. It was said that the House had slipped its time, and that, although the House might consider it its duty to put upon the record its disapproval of the language used by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL,] and its disapproval of the personal reflections cast by him upon the gentleman from Kentucky, the House is estopped from doing it by efflux of time. That point was deliberately made; it was deliberately decided upon by the Speaker, in perfect accordance, I am quite satisfied, with the principles of law and with every consideration of propriety which belongs to this subject.

But, sir, this point, once overruled, has been revived and again discussed. Now, permit me to say that I think it would have been, perhaps, a little fairer to this House, as I know it would have been fairer to its Presiding Officer, if, instead of rearguing this small question of the statute of limitations, gentlemen had simply taken the trouble to appeal from the decision of the Speaker at the time it was made. We should then have had the judgment of the House upon that decision, and, I doubt not, it would have been sustained.

Why, sir, not to advert at all to the several and satisfactory reasons which were given by the Speaker for his judgment upon that question, let me say to the gentleman making the point that this committee was appointed and its instructions given by a unanimous vote of this House. Now, even under the rules, two thirds of the House may at pleasure suspend any of the rules. But, according to this doctrine, a unanimous vote of this House, instructing this committee to inquire into all the circumstances and facts of the case and to report what action they demanded, is not to take effect because of the phraseology of the rule which has been cited. Thus gentlemen place themselves in the predicament of maintaining that, although two thirds of this House may suspend every rule embraced in the Digest, the whole House cannot suspend a single rule of order.

Before leaving this subject I wish simply to say that, with regard to the gentleman from Iowa, the committee found in the course of its investigations that the assault which was committed was committed for words spoken in debate. It was so admitted by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky himself. Nobody alleged or presumed that it was committed for any other cause. Then, sir, when the committee found that the assault was committed for words spoken in debate—when the committee found that the provoking cause of the assault was embraced in the personal reflections made by the gentleman from Iowa upon the gentleman from Kentucky, were the mouths of the committee to be closed and were they to be forbidden to report to this House that in their judgment the immediate cause of the assault, which was a violation of the privileges of this House, was the language of the gentleman from Iowa, and were they, while recommending a certain punishment for the higher breach of privilege by the gentleman from Kentucky, to pass by in utter silence and without any disapproval the unjustifiable reflections which occasioned the assault?

Mr. THAYER. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to give me a few minutes more.

Mr. SPALDING. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. THAYER. I say it is under these circumstances that gentlemen may feel themselves at liberty to reflect on the report of the committee, because they have ventured to suppose that the language of the member from Iowa should meet with the disapproval of the House; and it is for this that my colleague has felt himself justified in characterizing the report as he has done.

I pass from that to the other question involved in the report, about which I have very little to say. The facts are all before the House. There is no dispute about those facts. They are simply these: that for words uttered in debate, a member of this House was violently assailed in his person, almost under the very eyes of the House of Representatives itself; that the gentleman who assailed him dealt him blow upon blow; that blood was drawn, and that the aggressor was backed by three friends with loaded pistols in their pockets. Those are the facts, and no rhetoric in which I could indulge could convey to the House a higher sense of the character of this assault than the simple facts.

Sir, much has been said about these gentlemen who accompanied the gentleman from Kentucky. Does any man believe that all these three persons were accidentally present? If he does let him read the evidence. The first, Colonel Pennybaker, was there undeniably, according to his own statement, because he expected the assault, and came to this House because he expected it to take place.

The second of these persons (Grigsby) had been told by Pennybaker to come to the House. It does not appear that he had been told to come for this purpose; but he was told to come to the House that afternoon, and he did come pursuant to that request. He says, "When he left my room, he (Pennybaker) asked me to call by his office, just this side of the Metropolitan hotel, and go up with him." And then he testifies that when he saw ROUSSEAU go out after GRINNELL, Colonel Pennybaker followed him, and he followed Pennybaker. And then he says, speaking of the parties present—

"There was some one standing near Mr. GRINNELL, a large, heavy-set man. I do not know who he was. I did not know whether he was, in fact, with Mr. GRINNELL, or whether he went out of the House with him or not. I had my eye principally on him. I had no disposition to interfere between the parties."

"When Mr. ROUSSEAU first commenced raising his cane, I thought I saw him knit his brows, and I thought, perhaps, it might be his intention to interfere. I stopped over between him and ROUSSEAU, to be ready in case he should interfere."

He was ready, with a loaded pistol in his pocket, to interfere in an affray which I maintain the evidence will justify anybody in believing he knew was to take place.

Mr. RAYMOND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. THAYER. I have but a few seconds left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has just a half minute.

Mr. RAYMOND. Does it not distinctly appear that Grigsby was not there with any knowledge of the fact that the affray was to take place?

Mr. THAYER. I am aware that he says so himself, but the evidence will satisfy anybody to the contrary.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, in bringing this protracted debate to a close I desire to place before the House and the country certain propositions which I believe to be abundantly supported by constitutional and parliamentary law:

1. Either House of Congress has the inherent power of protecting itself from injury or insult; and it has also the implied power of punishing what are termed contempts and infringements of its privileges by the exercise of a summary jurisdiction correctly deduced from the Constitution itself. (Rawle on the Constitution, 48; Anderson vs. Dunn, 6 Wheaton, 204.)

2. For any speech or debate in either House, a member cannot be questioned in any other place. (Article 1, section 6, of the Constitution.)

Not even for words reflecting upon the character or conduct of a fellow-member.

"Taking care not to say anything disrespectful to the House, a member may state whatever he thinks fit in debate, however offensive it may be to the feelings or injurious to the character of individuals, and he is protected by his privilege from any action for libel, as well as from any other question or molestation."—May's Parliamentary Practice, page 114.

3. Although a member may not be questioned in any other place for offensive words spoken in the House, yet he is liable to censure and punishment by the House itself.

In the English House of Commons members have been censured, imprisoned, and even expelled for intemperate speeches on the floor. (May's Parliamentary Practice, 113.)

The conclusion of the whole matter is this: no member of either House of Congress is permitted to assault the person of any other member for any language, however offensive, used in debate.

A different rule, or one that would measure out the punishment for such a breach of the privileges of the House, in accordance with the provocation given, would establish a despotism of the most revolting character.

Every speaker on the floor of Congress would have occasion to look over his shoulder and take note of the effect of his words upon every one of his hearers, lest, forsooth, on leaving this Hall for his lodgings, the "bludgeon of a bully" should arrest his footsteps.

If such is to be the practice hereafter, the responsibility shall not rest with me. I now ask a vote on the resolution.

Mr. BANKS. The time of the gentleman from Ohio is not entirely exhausted. I ask him to yield me a few moments.

Mr. SPALDING. Certainly. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Ohio having closed the debate, and having taken his seat, no further discussion can be allowed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the right of the gentleman from Ohio to keep the floor and to yield it till the end of his hour. The gentleman has fourteen minutes remaining which he yields to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, it does not belong to me to vindicate the privileges of the House, although I have held service here for several years, some time since; but my position as a member here would not justify me in speaking on questions of this character. I therefore did not intend to speak upon it. The Speaker put me upon the committee in this case, and I discharged the duties devolved upon me as I could; and but for the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] as to the manner in which the committee discharged its duty I should have nothing to say.

The decision of the Speaker of this House on the question raised by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] was as clearly stated, and in my judgment as perfectly just as any decision ever made in any parliamentary body. Any other conclusion than that which he stated would have assailed the records of the House and degraded the parliamentary law of the country. The rule of the Manual which has been sustained as a rule governing members of the House in the ordinary course of business is, that when a question is in debate, and a member offers remarks upon it, if any exceptions be taken to his remarks they must be taken at the time the remarks are made. If the House pass to other business no member has a right to call in question the statements that have been made. This is not peculiar to our laws of legislative debate. It is the parliamentary law regulating every proceeding of deliberative assemblies. When the Speaker of the House has made a decision, members who take exception to it must do so when the decision is made, and if dissatisfied may take an appeal. And yet we have heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] declare that he set aside the decision of the Speaker on this question and treated it as if it had not been made, and he discussed deliberately the question of order from beginning to end precisely as if an appeal from the decision of the Chair had been pending.

Why did he do this wrong to the Speaker of the House, and trespass and trample upon the rules of this legislative assembly by violating this principle? I will tell you why it was. It was because the question involving the decision of the Speaker came before the House upon a different case, upon the merits of the resolution reported by the committee; and therefore he had a right to reconsider any question connected with it. So it is with the rights of the select committee. The House, by its deliberate order, sent to a committee of privilege a question of privilege. They ordered that committee to report upon all the circumstances connected with that question. Now, if any member of this House supposes that any committee of five honorable men would have pronounced a judgment against the gentleman from Kentucky on account of his part in this transaction without referring to, rehearsing, and expressing their opinions on the circumstances which led to that transaction, they certainly mistook the character of the gentlemen who were selected to compose that committee; and I do not hesitate to say that if the members of this House be asked to pass judgment upon the action of the gentleman from Kentucky in this assault, and exclude all consideration of the part of the gentleman from Iowa in producing that assault, it will be as flagrant an act of injustice as was ever committed in the history of the world. No man can properly consider the part which the gentleman from Kentucky had in this matter, and exclude the part which the gentleman from Iowa took in its initiation.

Therefore the committee passed upon that question. They were called upon to review the whole case and express their opinion. And let me say to the members of this House that the precedent sought to be established here this day is the most vital precedent ever established in a legislative assembly, and will hereafter justify a resort to the law of violence whenever any man or any party shall choose to enforce it. I have listened to this debate for three days, and I have heard but little other than careful considerations relating to the personal positions of these two gentlemen; one consideration offset against another consideration, and the whole intellect and ingenuity of the members of this legislative assembly exclusively directed to that view of the subject.

I have not heard discussed that which is the real and only question before this House. I have not heard an allusion to the dignity of this assembly, an assembly which is, or which ought to be, the first parliamentary assembly on the face of the earth, as it is the only deliberative assembly where the people of the nation are represented. I have heard hardly any reference made to that dignity and those privileges with which this assembly is clothed by the terms of the Constitution, the most sacred of all the privileges with which the people of our country are invested; they have been hardly recurred to in all these three days' debate.

Let me, then, speak a word upon that subject. The highest of all privileges is the immunity and inviolability of person. If I am to be insulted, bullied, brow-beaten, attacked, disabled, as a member of this House from the State of Massachusetts, then the people I represent have no rights. Therefore, at the foundation of this Government lies the inviolability of the Representative. And what have we seen here? The Ajax of this House, he who should be the leader, comes in here with a proposition to justify—for I can only interpret it in that way—to justify the assault which has been made upon the member from Iowa. And what was the character of that assault? A member of this House has been beaten; he has been beaten with stripes; he has been beaten with stripes in the presence of this House, as it were; he has been beaten with stripes in the presence of this House, for words spoken in debate. What should be the conclusion of this assembly? That any member so abusing his privileges and the dignity of this House ought not to sit longer in it as a member. It is no injustice to the member from Kentucky that we should adopt this conclusion. If he undertook to vindicate his own rights, as a soldier and as a man he should be willing to pay the penalty of his act. In this case there is no philosophy but the maxim of the McGregors, for a man like him or for any man who occupies his position.

Let him play his game boldly, but let him also pay the forfeit manfully. What is that forfeit? That he should cease, for a time at least, to sit as a member of this House. So the committee have reported. When he returns to his constituents they will review the circumstances, and they may reflect him. If so he will be received here or not, as the case may justify. In any event he is purged; and the House is purged of the indignity and the wrong which have been inflicted upon its members and upon itself.

If there be any other conclusion than this, then, sir, the dignity of this assembly must be defended by other persons than those who now represent its power. What do gentlemen propose instead of this? I have heard much philosophical discussion upon this subject. Gentlemen say that a disapproval is a censure; and if a disapproval is a censure, then a censure or a reprimand is a mere disapproval; and the judgment of this House is to be expressed upon a case of the most ineffable wrong that can be committed upon its members by a disapproval of the act! A member is beaten with stripes in the Capitol for words spoken in debate; and the highest act of justice and of dignity that this assembly can perform is to say that it disapproves the act! Sir, as one of the committee and as member of this House, I can give no vote of that character. I will not set the seal of my name to a record and a judgment which must degrade the dignity of the House and destroy its parliamentary privileges forever hereafter.

Let me say a word, sir, in regard to the three wronged and innocent men who a little while since were by a happy accident on the eastern portico of the Capitol, a part by invitation a part by chance, with arms in their hands, taking their places, one here, another there, another there, with a view to the movements of somebody else, keeping clear space and field of action while a member of this House was being assaulted. We are told now that it will be an infringement upon the rights of those men if the House of Representatives, the first parliamentary assembly of the world, should even question them for their conduct so much as to invite them here to answer for their action. They are not arraigned; they are not charged with anything. It is not alleged that they are responsible as parties to this assault. But the facts are stated in plain Saxon language; and it is recommended that these men should be called to the bar of the House to answer to any charge which this House may have to make against them.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will read the resolution, he will find that it amounts to an absolute conviction of these men.

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; I say that the committee were instructed to investigate this whole transaction, and whoever was concerned in it, whether by premeditation or by presence as a party, we are bound to report the facts to the House with our recommendations, leaving the question for the action of the House. I do not care what may have been the language of the resolution instructing the committee. That resolution was certainly not intended by the House to mark out for the committee every step that they should take, every word that they should speak, and every judgment that they should give. The House put its dignity, its rights, its privileges, into the hands of this committee—a committee of privilege—and instructed it, in its integrity and fidelity, to report to the House its views of this case; and it did so.

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman from Ohio has expired, and as the previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered no further debate is in order.

Mr. STEVENS. I simply desire to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he misunderstood my remark. What I meant to suggest to him was that in the resolution of the committee they convict these three men and order them to be brought to the bar of the House without their ever having had a hearing.

Mr. THAYER. They are to be brought here that their conduct may be investigated.

Mr. BANKS. If the House will allow me a remark out of order in reply to a remark out of order, I will say that the committee in its resolution states the facts and pronounces no judgment, but asks the judgment of the House upon the facts.

Here the debate was closed.

The resolutions reported by the majority of the committee are as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, a Representative from Kentucky, by committing an assault upon the person of Hon. J. B. GRINNELL, a Representative from the State of Iowa, for words spoken in debate, has justly forfeited his privileges as a member of this House, and is hereby expelled.

Resolved, That the personal reflections made by Mr. GRINNELL, a Representative from the State of Iowa, in presence of the House, upon the character of Mr. ROUSSEAU, a Representative from the State of Kentucky, were in violation of rules regulating debate and the privileges of its members founded thereon, and merit the disapproval of the House.

Resolved, That Charles D. Pennybaker of Kentucky, L. B. Grigsby of Kentucky, and John S. McGrew of Ohio, by their presence and participation in a premeditated personal assault between Hon. Mr. ROUSSEAU of Kentucky, and Hon. Mr. GRINNELL of Iowa, on account of words spoken in debate, in which the persons if not the lives of members of this House were imperiled, were guilty of a violation of its privileges, and they are hereby ordered to be brought to the bar of this House to answer for their contempt of its privileges.

The motion of Mr. RAYMOND was to strike out the first resolution and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Resolved, That LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU be, and he is hereby, reprimanded for the violation of the rights and privileges of the House of which he was guilty in the personal assault committed by him upon Hon. J. B. GRINNELL for words spoken in debate.

The motion of Mr. STEVENS as modified was to strike out all of the resolutions reported by the majority and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Resolved, That Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU be summoned to the bar of the House, and be there publicly reprimanded by the Speaker for the violation of the rights and privileges of the House, of which he was guilty in the personal assault committed by him upon Hon. J. B. GRINNELL for words spoken in debate.

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. STEVENS.

Mr. WRIGHT. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 35, nays 94, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baxter, Bingham, Reader W. Clarke, Davis, DeFrees, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Kasson, George V. Lawrence, Marvin, McRuer, Miller, Moorhead, Myers, Newell, Orth, Price, Scofield, Stevens, Welker, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Benjamin, Bidwell, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Buckland, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jencks, Johnson, Julian, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, Latham, Lathin, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McCullough, McKee, Mercer, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, O'Neill, Perham, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wright—94.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Goodyear, Grinnell, Harris, Hayes, Hill, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, Kelso, Kuykendall, Marshall, McIndoe, Paine, Patterson, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Rousseau, Schenck, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, Williams, and Winfield—53.

So the amendment of Mr. STEVENS was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WILLIAMS said: I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. SMITH, who, I suppose, would have voted ay. I would have voted no.

Mr. DAWES. My colleague, Mr. BALDWIN, is detained from the House by sickness, and has paired with Mr. DENISON. I think my colleague would have voted no.

Mr. ANCONA. My colleague, Mr. COFFROTH, is detained from the House by sickness.

The result having been announced as above recorded,

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. RAYMOND.

Mr. BROMWELL. Is an amendment now in order?

The SPEAKER. Not under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. BROMWELL. How will it be if this is voted down?

The SPEAKER. The question will then recur on the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. GRIDER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment offered by Mr. RAYMOND, it was decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 69, not voting 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Reader W. So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the first resolution reported by the committee, which is as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, a Representative from Kentucky, by committing an assault upon the person of Hon. J. B. GRINNELL, a Representative from the State of Iowa, for words spoken in debate, has justly forfeited his privileges as a member of this House, and is hereby expelled.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 72, nays 51, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Reader W. Clarke, Dawes, DeFrees, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Randall, Ross, Rousseau, Schenck, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, Williams, and Winfield—59.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the resolution was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. LONGYEAR said: I was paired off upon this question with Mr. SMITH, of Kentucky, but I have learned since making the pair that he has been confirmed as Governor of Montana Territory. If so he has ceased to be a member of the House and the pair is not binding. If any member of the Kentucky delegation will state that he has not resigned his seat, I will still stand by the pair; but otherwise I shall ask to have my vote recorded.

Mr. WRIGHT. Can the roll-call be interrupted in this manner?

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Let me answer the question of the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. The House is acting under the previous question, and no debate is in order unless by unanimous consent. The gentleman from New Jersey objects.

Mr. WRIGHT. I simply made the inquiry whether the roll-call could be interrupted in this manner.

The SPEAKER. That is an objection.

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce that Mr. MARSHALL is absent on account of sickness, and has paired upon this question with Mr. ROSS.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. Did not the gentleman from Massachusetts change his vote?

The SPEAKER. He did.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then he did not vote with the majority.

The SPEAKER. He voted with the prevailing side.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will it not require a two-third vote to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. The rule in regard to reconsideration will be found upon page 164 of the Digest. It is that any member who votes with the prevailing side may move a reconsideration. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Chair will state that it requires a majority to reconsider.

As the House is now acting under the operation of the previous question, the motion to reconsider will be entered at the Clerk's desk.

The question recurred on agreeing to the second resolution reported by the committee, which is as follows:

Resolved, That the personal reflections made by Mr. GRINNELL, a Representative from the State of Iowa, in presence of the House, upon the character of Mr. ROUSSEAU, a Representative from the State of Kentucky, were in violation of the rules regulating debate and the privileges of its members founded thereon, and merit the disapproval of the House.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to lay that resolution on the table.

Mr. BANKS. Would that not carry all the papers with it?

The SPEAKER. It would not, as the House is acting separately on the resolutions.

Mr. FINCK. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay upon the table.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion to lay the second resolution upon the table, and it was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and I also move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. LATHAM. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was then laid upon the table.

The question then was upon agreeing to the third resolution reported by the committee, as follows:

Resolved, That Charles D. Pennybaker, of Kentucky, L. B. Grigsby, of Kentucky, and John S. McGrow, of Ohio, by their presence and participation in a premeditated personal assault between Hon. Mr. ROUSSEAU of Kentucky, and Hon. Mr. GRINNELL of Iowa, on account of words spoken in debate, in which the persons, if not the lives, of members of this House were imperiled, were guilty of a violation of its privileges, and they are hereby ordered to be brought to the bar of this House to answer for their contempt of its privileges.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to lay that resolution on the table.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I would suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] to withdraw his motion to lay on the table and allow me to move to postpone this resolution.

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order without unanimous consent, as the House is acting under the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Up to this time neither of the actors in this affair have been reprimanded or punished in any way, and I think those who were the mere witnesses of the affair ought to be let off.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I would like to have the yeas and nays upon this motion to lay the resolution upon the table.

The yeas and nays were not ordered. The question was taken upon the motion to lay the resolution on the table; and upon a division there were—ayes 54, noes 70.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HALE. Is it in order to call for a division of the question upon this resolution, as it affects three different persons by a process which in its nature is quasi criminal?

The SPEAKER. The resolution is so framed that it cannot be divided, so as to have each part a substantive proposition by itself.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I call for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. PHELPS, (at fifteen minutes to six o'clock p. m.) I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes twenty-three, noes not counted.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the resolution; and upon a division there were—ayes 73, noes 43.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WENTWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS. I now call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the first resolution reported by the committee failed to be agreed to.

Mr. FINCK. I rise to a point of order, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] not having voted with the majority, has no right to make the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already once decided that question of order.

Mr. FINCK. I desire to say in support of my point of order, that the rule requires that in order to entitle a member to move a reconsideration of any vote, he must have voted with the majority. It is stated that a fair construction of the rule would require that in the case of a tie vote, a member voting on the prevailing side should have the right to move a reconsideration. But this is not such a case; this was not a tie vote, and the member from Massachusetts voted with the minority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. Some member must have the right to move a reconsideration. In this case he certainly could not move a reconsideration, if he voted on the side which did not prevail, for he evidently is not in the constitutional majority on that question. And if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] is right in his point of order, no one can move a reconsideration, for the side which prevailed was in the minority. The usage upon this subject has been uniform, and the Chair is surprised that there are no cases cited in the Digest. But it is plain that any member voting on the prevailing side has the right to move a reconsideration. Such has always been the practice in Congress, as well as in all State legislative bodies, so far as the Chair is informed.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to give notice that if the House shall reconsider the vote by which the first resolution failed to be adopted, I shall move as a substitute therefor substantially the resolution reported by the minority of the committee. I now call the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the resolution, which was as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, a Representative from Kentucky, by committing an assault upon the person of Hon. J. B. GRINNELL, a Representative from the State of Iowa, for words spoken in debate has justly forfeited his privileges as a member of this House, and is hereby expelled.

Mr. BANKS. I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and inserting the following, on which I ask the previous question:

That Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, a member of this House from the State of Kentucky, be summoned to the bar of the House, and be there publicly reprimanded by the Speaker for the violation of its rights and privileges of which he was guilty in the personal assault committed by him upon the person of Hon. J. B. GRINNELL, a member of this House from the State of Iowa, for words spoken in debate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the House has already acted on that precise proposition, and that it cannot now be acted on again.

The SPEAKER. The House has acted on a similar resolution as a substitute for the entire series of three resolutions. It is now offered as a substitute for one resolution. It is therefore a different proposition, and is in order.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BOYER. I move that the resolution and pending amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion of Mr. BOYER was not agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. BANKS was agreed to.

The question recurred on the resolution as amended.

Mr. ELDRIDGE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 89, nays 30, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, James B. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Ketcham, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McRuer, Morcu, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Price, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—89.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Boyer, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Le Blond, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, and Wright—30.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Bundy, Chanter, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grinnell, Harris, Hayes, Hill, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Jones, Kelso, Kuykendall, Latham, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, Paine, Patterson, Pike, Plants, Pomerooy, Radford, William H. Randall, Ross, Rousseau, Schenck, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stillwell, Strouse, John L. Thomas, Upson, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Williams, and Winfield—63.

So the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. ROSS said: On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MARSHALL. If he were here he would vote no, while I should vote ay.

The result was announced as above stated.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following:

Resolved, That this House declares the personal reflections made by Mr. GRINNELL, a Representative from the State of Iowa, in presence of this House, on the day of June last, on the character of Mr. ROUSSEAU, a Representative from the State of Kentucky, to have been in violation of the rules of the House and the privileges of its members, and that this House does hereby censure the said JOSIAH B. GRINNELL therefor.

Mr. PRICE. I object.

PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

Mr. MOORHEAD, from the Committee on Manufactures, presented a report on the subject of a protective tariff, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRIMBLE asked and obtained leave to present a minority report on the same subject.

Mr. HALE moved that five thousand copies extra of the minority report be printed.

The motion was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the Committee on Enrolled Bills had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 343) to quiet land titles in California; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 387) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1887, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagrees to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate to the said bill, and agree to the committee of conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ANCONA asked and obtained leave of absence.

Mr. ROGERS asked and obtained leave of absence for one day.

Mr. INGERSOLL asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Cook for ten days.

And then, on motion of Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, the House (at six o'clock and five minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By the SPEAKER: The petition of T. P. Devereux, of Halifax, North Carolina, for relief.

By Mr. EGGLESTON: The petition of the Cincinnati and Memphis Steam Packet Boat Company, praying authority to change the name of the steamboat Alice Dean to Glendale.

By Mr. MERCUR: The petition of 22 citizens of Sheshequin, Bradford county, Pennsylvania, asking that the tariff laws may be so amended as to protect their labor.

By Mr. O'NEILL: A petition of citizens of Philadelphia interested in mineral lands and mining in California, Nevada, Colorado, Utah, Montana, Idaho, and Arizona, urging upon the House of Representatives to pass Senate bill entitled "An act to legalize the occupation of mineral lands, and to extend the right of preemption thereto."

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 18, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.

On motion of Mr. STEWART, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of S. G. Burbridge, late major general of volunteers, praying for compensation for Daniel Mills, a freedman, who contributed to the defeat of John Morgan by furnishing valuable information to the Union Army; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

SUBSTITUTE FOR COTTON.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to send to the Chair a communication from the Acting Commissioner of Agriculture. It will be recollested that three years ago an appropriation of $20,000 was made to test the practicability of cultivating and preparing hemp or flax as a substitute for cotton, under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture. This fund has been administered by the Commissioner of Agriculture with very great economy and with very good results. Although the process of cottonizing flax, or reducing flax to such a condition that it may be spun upon cotton machinery, has not been attained, and perhaps from the nature of the fiber may never be attained—that is a question yet to be settled—very great improvements have been made in the use of flax. It has been applied to many different articles in which before it was unknown. In some it is equal to cotton; in some it is superior to cotton; in some it is inferior to cotton; but from its greater cheapness it produces a very valuable fabric. The Commissioner of Agriculture states that of the fund of $20,000 he has transferred back $10,500 to the surplus fund of the Treasury; and in these days when there is a deficiency bill for everything, I thought that so economical an administration was deserving of honorable mention. I move that the communication lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 436) to reorganize the clerical force of the War Department, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 190) in regard to rations of Union soldiers held as prisoners of war, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 187) recommending the reorganization and instruction of the militia of the several States, and providing for the distribution of ordnance and ordnance stores, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 77) respecting brevet rank to officers of the Army, reported adversely thereon, and moved that it be indefinitely postponed; which motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 191) to provide clerical force for military divisions and departments, reported adversely thereon, and moved the indefinite postponement of the bill; which motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 188) for the appointment of a commission on transportation between the western States and the Atlantic sea-board, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 156) to amend the ninth section of the act entitled "An act to increase the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, and for other purposes," reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 20) requesting the President to suspend any order mustering out the officers of the Veteran Reserve corps until Congress shall take some legislative action in regard to the corps, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 701) granting a pension to Mrs. Imogene Buckingham, of Edgar county, Illinois, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 46) for the relief of Martha McCook, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Elisha Baxter, late colonel of the fourth regiment Arkansas mounted infantry in the United States service, praying for such legislation as will enable the officers and men of that command to obtain compensation for services rendered and property lost as if they had been regularly mustered on the day of their respective enlistments, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Walter F. Halleck, late a second lieutenant in the Veteran Reserve corps, praying that he may be reinstated in his former position in that corps, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I am also directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 87) for the relief of certain volunteer officers appointed by the President, to report it back adversely; and as this subject has been acted upon by the Senate, I move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I am also directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 77) to provide for the examination of certain officers of the Army, to report it back to the Senate; and as that provision is incorporated in the Army bill, I move the indefinite postponement of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following petitions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims, which was agreed to; namely:

A petition of J. W. Turner, of the Veteran Reserve corps, praying that he may be allowed pay for traveling and subsistence from Young's Point, Louisiana, to his home in Iowa;

A petition of Annie E. Dixon, praying for a pension;

A petition of D. A. Daniels, praying for compensation for services rendered while second lieutenant of the third Minnesota battery;

A petition of Mrs. Mary Good, praying for a pension;

A petition of William H. Johnson, praying for compensation for services rendered as a private in company I, fourteenth regiment New York heavy artillery, while in the service of the United States, which, on account of his color, cannot be paid by the Paymaster General; and

A petition of Myles Doran, of the fourteenth regiment Michigan volunteers, praying that he may be allowed the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant from the 3d of February, 1865, to the 18th of July, 1865.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following petitions and memorials, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A petition of Enos Kellsey, of Napoli, New York, praying for a pension;

A petition of hospital stewards of the Army, praying that they may be placed on an equal footing with those who perform similar services in European armies, namely, second lieutenants of infantry;

A petition of Andrew Branstetter, praying for a pension;

A petition of James A. Paige and others, late chaplains in the Army, praying that they may not be required to refund the amounts drawn by them for commutation for fuel and quarters from June, 1862, to April, 1863;

A memorial of the Legislature of New York in favor of retaining the Veteran Reserve corps in the military service of the United States;

A memorial of members of the Signal corps stationed in Texas, praying for the discharge of that corps of the Army;

A petition of enlisted men of company G, eighth regiment United States Veteran volunteers, praying that they may be paid the bounty due them, which was lost through the carelessness or fraud of a disbursing officer;

A petition of discharged officers of the volunteer army, praying that the Veteran Reserve corps may be made part of the standing Army of the United States; and

A petition of citizens of the United States, praying that one hundred and sixty acres of land may be granted to the soldiers of the late war.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 424) to incorporate the Washington Temperance Society, of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 779) to incorporate the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 383) to incorporate the American Cotton Company, of the District of Columbia, moved that it be indefinitely postponed; which motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Washington, praying that the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia may be authorized to appoint an additional number of notaries, reported adversely thereon, and moved the indefinite postponement of the subject; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW, from the select committee on ventilation, submitted a report, with accompanying documents, constituting an examination of the plan of ventilation; which was ordered to be printed.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 737) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, have directed me to report it back with sundry amendments, which I wish to have printed so that the bill may be ready to-morrow morning, when I propose to take it up.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3) to revive the grade of General in the United States Army, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (S. No. 343) to quiet land titles in California; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 439) to amend an act approved June 21, 1866, entitled "An act for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

POTOMAC WATER.

Mr. JOHNSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 135) relating to the supply of Potomac water to the Capitol, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution. I understand that the supply for the last two or three days has been altogether inadequate, and it is said to be owing to the extravagant use of the water in the city below. They are using it in the streets constantly. There is now not water enough in the Capitol to supply the wants of the day. It can be corrected, as it is imagined, by prohibiting, by some regulation which the Secretary of the Interior may authorize, the unnecessary use of the water that is now being made in the city.

Mr. GRIMES. Let the resolution be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, which proposes to authorize the Commissioner of Public Buildings, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to take such immediate measures as he may think best to cause a constant supply of Potomac water to the Capitol.

Mr. GRIMES. I should be hardly willing to pass that resolution, in its present form at any rate. The Commissioner of Public Buildings may choose to go and build a new aqueduct under this resolution. It gives him unlimited power. I desire to say, in answer to the statement of the Senator from Maryland, that to my certain knowledge the policemen are going around this morning notifying the people that they must not waste the water as they have been doing the last four or five days. I know it has been wasted, and the result has been that there has been a deficient supply. Almost every man has had a water-works in front of his house, going, some of them, nearly the whole day, and the night besides. But the notification of which I speak has been given this morning, and I apprehend that from this time forward there will be no difficulty on the subject. But this resolution would authorize the Commissioner of Public Buildings to expend an unlimited amount of money.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Secretary of the Interior was applied to, and I understand said the fault was only to be corrected by enlarging the dam. That cannot be done, for the necessity is an immediate one. Certainly it was not my purpose to authorize the Commissioner or to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to increase the supply of water in the way suggested by the honorable member from Iowa. I move, however, the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

PARK AND PRESIDENTIAL MANSION.

Mr. HENDRICKS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds (to whom were referred two resolutions of the Senate directing them to inquire what tracts of land containing not less than one hundred acres adjoining or near this city can be obtained, and for what prices, for a park and site for a presidential mansion, and which shall combine convenience of access and healthfulness, good water, and capability of adornment,) be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ a practical landscape gardener or topographical engineer to examine the different tracts of land offered to the committee for such purpose, who shall report to the committee in December next the adaptability of each tract for the object contemplated by said resolutions.

NAVAL PENSION FUND.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 95) amendatory of a resolution regulating the investment of the naval pension fund, approved July 1, 1864, the pending question being on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the resolution read before the vote is taken on its passage.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a resolution approved July 1, 1864, entitled "A resolution regulating the investment of the naval pension fund," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to require such portion of the said fund as is thereby ordered to be invested in registered securities of the United States to be made a permanent loan to the United States at six per cent. interest per annum in coin, payable on the 1st day of January and the 1st day of July of each year: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to amend or alter the aforesaid resolution except so far as relates to the mode of investment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] made some objection to this measure when it was up before. It seems to me the manifest objection is that this is a permanent investment at six per cent., payable in gold, when everybody, I think, contemplates a reduction of the rate of interest. I do not see any substantial use in making a permanent investment of this character. The Senator from Maine, who made some objection, is not now in his seat.

Mr. GRIMES. When the Senator from Maine objected to this resolution the other day, I suffered it to lie until the Secretary of the Treasury came down and urged that it should be passed, and I went with the Assistant Secretary to see the Senator from Maine, and he thought there was no objection to it. The Secretary of the Treasury wants it passed, because he is now carrying nine or ten million dollars of this fund as a part of his temporary loan, and he does not like to have it appear there. Under the resolution to which this is an amendment, it is provided that the naval pension fund shall be invested in six per cent. registered bonds. The Secretary of the Navy now has the authority to require those bonds from the Secretary of the Treasury, or he can take this money and go into the market in New York and buy bonds and hold them as registered bonds. There is no particular advantage in his doing that, and, besides, it imposes on him the necessity of providing safes and vaults to keep the bonds. This resolution provides that the fund shall stand on the books of the Treasury as a permanent fund, without the formality between these two Departments of issuing registered bonds. That is all there is of it. The resolution is drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, and sent to me through the hands of the Assistant Secretary.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the whole amount standing to the credit of the Navy pension fund?

Mr. GRIMES. About ten millions, I believe. I do not know that there is that amount uninvested, but that is the whole amount.

Mr. JOHNSON. I meant to ask, what is the amount to be invested under this resolution?

Mr. GRIMES. It is several million dollars; eight or nine millions, I think.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rose for the purpose of asking whether under the resolution the fund in the hands of the Treasury received in currency is to be invested in securities of the United States, dollar for dollar, to be paid in coin afterwards. If so, that would seem to be making the United States pay more than they ought to pay.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not prepared to say how it was received; but I have only this to say, that if the Senator is disposed to drive a hard bargain with the naval pension fund which we have dedicated to a specific purpose for the last sixty years, all that is necessary for the Secretary of the Navy to do is to draw this money from the Treasury and go into the market and buy these six per cent. gold-bearing bonds.

Mr. JOHNSON. At 110?

Mr. GRIMES. At whatever they may be worth. This is simply a fund that is set apart in the Treasury out of which to pay one class of pensioners. It belongs to the Government as a trust fund. It is not proposed to change the rate of interest, either to increase or to diminish it, but to pay this fund standing in the light of a public creditor toward the Treasury, just as we pay everybody else.

Mr. JOHNSON. We do not pay everybody else in the same way. The pensioners are not paid in gold; they are paid in currency.

Mr. GRIMES. We do not pay the pensioners in gold, but you pay everybody to whom you issue one of your six per cent. bonds in gold.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course you do.

Mr. GRIMES. And you have provided by law that six per cent. bonds shall be issued for this fund. The Secretary of the Navy can tomorrow demand six per cent. bonds; but for the convenience of the Treasury, we provide in this resolution that the Treasury shall not be under the necessity of issuing a thousand different $1,000 bonds, but that a mere declaration upon the statute-book shall stand in place of them. That is all.

Mr. JOHNSON. Are they authorized now to invest in six per cent. bonds payable in coin?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Under the laws as they stand?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. But they must pay the market price.

Mr. GRIMES. They can demand of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the bonds. If the Secretary refuses to obey, then, if they choose, they can go into the market and buy them; but it is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, as the law now stands, to issue these bonds upon the request of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state what the facts are as I understand them. The law requires that this fund shall be invested in registered bonds of the United States, but it says nothing about the rate of interest. It is the duty of the Secretary of the Navy so to invest it. The difficulty, as I understand, is, that the Secretary of the Treasury offered him five per cent. bonds, but he declined to receive them, and demanded six per cent. interest; and the Secretary of the Treasury finally acquiesced in that being done, as I was informed by the Assistant Secretary yesterday, supposing that it did not make any very great difference, as the interest would be probably sufficient to pay these pensions, and the pensions must be paid. These bonds are not in the market, but the money is substantially in the Treasury, as the Senator from Iowa says. The money could, at any time we direct, undoubtedly be made to bear only five per cent. interest, I presume. That would not affect the contract with the parties who are our pensioners. I myself was inclined to think that five per cent. bonds ought to be issued, and for that reason I had this matter laid on the table until I could look further into it. I was informed that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Navy had been in consultation about it, and that this very resolution was drawn at the Treasury Department, and sent here; and so understanding, I came to the conclusion that I would not interfere with it any further, because I really cannot see that it makes any great difference in the end so far as the payment of interest is concerned.

Mr. JOHNSON. My friend from Iowa suggested that I was disposed to drive a hard bargain with this fund.

Mr. GRIMES. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON. Such an idea was farthest from my thoughts. I desire, however, to inquire if this is not making an investment that will increase the fund. If you invest at par and give bonds that can be sold at 110 it has that effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. They may be 125 before long.

Mr. GRIMES. We do not propose to have the bonds issued; that is the very purpose of this resolution. As the law now stands, the Secretary of the Navy can demand the bonds and then sell them for 110 or 125 if they should be worth that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Secretary of the Treasury can refuse to issue the registered bonds.

Mr. JOHNSON. The fund is not entitled to six per cent. bonds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator from Iowa will consent to the postponement of the bill, I will go to the Treasury and consult further in regard to this matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. To enable the Senator from Maine to look into the matter, I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill; and I desire to take up a bill that will consume very little time and lead to no debate, which must be passed to-day—Senate bill No. 300, commonly called the funding bill. I desire to propose certain amendments to it, which, I think, will remove the objections to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to postpone the further consideration of the joint resolution until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

FUNDING OF THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 300.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 300) to reduce the rate of interest on the national debt and for funding the same, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. VAN WINKLE, to strike out all of the third section after the word "least," in the seventh line, and to insert the following:

Ninety million dollars, including the saving of interest aforesaid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, shall be semi-annually applied to the payment of the interest as it accrues, and the reduction of the principal of the said debt, by the purchase or redemption of the said bonds at not exceeding their par value, unless a greater rate is hereafter authorized by law.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I withdraw that amendment to enable the Senator from Ohio to offer some amendments which he has prepared.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to propose certain amendments which have the unanimous sanction, I believe, of the Committee on Finance, so as to make this bill express their unanimous sentiments. I move to strike out the third section of the bill and to insert in lieu thereof:

That in lieu of the sinking fund contemplated by the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes and for the repayment or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862, there shall be annually applied to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt the sum of $180,000,000, which sum is hereby appropriated for that purpose out of any money not otherwise appropriated; and so much of said sum as is not required to pay the accruing interest on said debt shall be applied to the purchase or payment of such of the public debt as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to hear that amendment reported again.

Mr. SHERMAN. Probably I can explain the matter more briefly to the Senator than by having it read. The law of 1862 provides for a sinking fund of one per cent. on the amount of the principal of the debt, the interest on which is computed in round numbers at $150,000,000. In order to simplify the whole system, this proposition proposes to appropriate $180,000,000 for the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt. It is a different form of sinking fund. That is the only material difference. It is an appropriation of a specific sum to be applied annually to the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt. A sufficient amount of it, as a matter of course, is to be applied to the payment of the interest, and the balance to the payment of the principal.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I propose the following amendment to come in as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That all money received into the Treasury of the United States for duties on imported goods shall be specially set apart and applied to the purposes following, to wit: first, to the payment of so much of the interest of the public debt as is payable in coin; second, to the payment as it matures of the principal of the public debt; third, to the payment of such appropriation by Congress as are required to be paid in coin; when the amount of coin in the Treasury exceeds $50,000,000 the excess shall be sold in open market in the city of New York for United States notes, under rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the notes received therefor shall be canceled.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. In section four, line seven, I move to strike out the word "six" and insert "four," so that the notice required for the conversion of the outstanding seventy-three notes shall be four months instead of six months.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to strike out the first and second sections of the bill, which provide for a new loan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer another amendment, to insert this as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of January, 1867, the lawful money required to be held on hand by the national banking associations under the thirty-first section of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, shall not consist in whole or in part of interest-bearing notes or bonds.

I will now state, so that the Senate may understand it distinctly, the effect of these amendments, for this is the last of them. The first and second sections of the bill, as originally reported, contained an authority to issue a new five per cent. loan, to be sold at not less than par, upon certain conditions and stipulations. As this gave rise to controversy and debate, not only in the committee, but in the Senate, and as it was believed that the Secretary of the Treasury had power sufficient at least to get along under the act that we passed in March last, the first and second sections are stricken out. Probably at the next session I may seek to confine the Secretary of the Treasury to a simple loan at five per cent.; but at present we leave him to the law as it was passed in the spring.

The third section provided for the funding. That has been somewhat changed by an amendment already adopted.

The fourth section provided for the outstanding seven-thirty Treasury notes due next year and the year following, and required the notice to be given of the exercise of the option contained in those Treasury notes. The term of the notice is now four months instead of six months.

The amendment now pending is an important one, and the Senate should be aware of its nature before it is acted upon. Under the present law, I think erroneously, they have got in the habit of regarding the compound-interest notes as a part of the reserve fund which the banks are required to hold on hand to redeem the national bank notes; and these compound-interest notes have been held as a reserve, instead of the United States notes. The law—and I think upon that we agree—contemplated that nothing but United States notes and coin should be held as the reserve. That was the opinion of the Finance Committee; and I think it is the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury. At any rate, a different construction has been acted upon by the Comptroller of the Currency from time to time; and the Secretary, although desirous of making the change, does not feel that he would be justified in making a change now by mere construction, and therefore submits it to Congress. The effect of this amendment will be, that after the 1st of January next compound-interest notes cannot be held by the national banks as a part of their reserve, but they will be compelled to dispose of those now held by them between this and the 1st of January, and keep in place of them United States notes. The tendency will be to reduce or retire from circulation so many United States notes as will be required to be held by the banks for their reserve.

Another amendment authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to sell in open market gold in excess of fifty millions, with a view to be applied to a reduction of United States notes. That amendment has already been adopted, and it is not necessary for me to state anything further than that the effect will be to avoid all the controversy about the sale of gold in the market, about which there has been a good deal of controversy.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has that been submitted to the Secretary?

Mr. SHERMAN. That amendment has been submitted to the Secretary and meets his approval. By it he is bound to keep gold in the Treasury until it amounts to fifty millions. He is bound to apply the gold in the Treasury, first, to the payment of the interest of the debt as it matures, payable in coin; then to the payment of such appropriations as shall be made in coin; and then to the payment of the principal of the national debt as it matures; and when the amount of gold exceeds $50,000,000, he is bound to sell it in open market in the city of New York, and apply the excess to the redemption of outstanding United States notes and to cancel those notes. The effect will be that if the amount of gold is very largely increased in the Treasury he will apply the excess to the reduction of the currency, and consequently to the contraction of the currency. I think this is the only explanation necessary in regard to this bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. The bill has been so much changed that I should like to hear it read as it now stands.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us have it printed.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow, and that the bill, as amended, be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no objection to that if anybody wants it done. It will be necessary to pass this bill to-morrow, if it is to be passed at all, and I give notice that I shall call it up to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to.

COMPENSATION OF OFFICERS OF SENATE.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up Senate bill No. 411.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 411) fixing the compensation of officers, clerks, messengers, and others in the service of the Senate, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the bill, in section one, line twelve, by striking out the word "eight" and inserting the word "nine;" so that it will read, "nine clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, $2,500 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I move further to amend the bill in section one, line eighteen, by striking out "five hundred" and inserting "one thousand;" so that the clause will read, "page in stationery room, $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. In section one; lines eighteen and nineteen, I move to strike out the words "$2 50 per day" and to insert "$1,000;" so that it will read, "page in Secretary's office, $1,000."

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not like to object, but $1,000 for a page is pretty high wages, it seems to me.

Mr. WADE. These are permanent pages, who receive about that sum now per day.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, the committee were instructed by the resolution under which they acted not to fix, nor to endeavor to fix, properly what should be the pay of these employes, but to equalize the sums received by the officers of the House and of the Senate for corresponding labor as nearly as we could come at it; and we have proceeded to do so. I do not know whether they receive too much or too little, for we did not take that into consideration. We did not suppose that we were authorized to do that under the resolution, which instructed us to make the salaries of the Senate employes as nearly equal as we could with the salaries of the employes of the House of Representatives. The House, by a resolution, some time ago, increased the salaries of all their officers receiving less than $1,200 by twenty-five per cent. We did not undertake to equalize the salaries here with that increased amount; but if the Senate should think that ought to be done, then, of course, it will be easy to fix it, because we have the certificate of the Clerk of the House showing what their employes received before and what this increase will make them. This bill, however, is drawn upon the higher rate, upon the increased compensation that the House has already bestowed upon their employes by a resolution.

The Senate employes, as a general thing, were not receiving as much compensation before this increase as the House employes were, and consequently the addition of twenty-five per cent. to the existing salaries would not make them equal in every case, and where that was the case we made them equal, at all events. They ought to have been equal, I suppose, for like services all the time, and we have endeavored to make them so. There are some offices of the different departments here that seem to be anomalous; there is nothing in the House to compare them to; but as the universal principle seemed to be to increase by twenty-five per cent. the salaries of the officers, I have prepared an amendment here that covers that kind of employes where there is no common standard of comparison, and I have done it by adding the same amount that seemed the general amount aimed at in the other cases. I move, therefore, that this bill be amended by adding as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That the chief engineer of the heating and ventilating apparatus shall be paid $1,740; two assistant engineers, $1,500 each; the captain of the Capitol police, $2,175; the lieutenant of the Capitol police, $1,875; twenty-nine Capitol policemen, $1,650 each; page to the Vice President, the same compensation as is paid to the other permanent pages of the Senate; one special policeman in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, $1,000; three laborers in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, $2.50 per day each; clerk of printing records of the Senate, $2,500; the Public Gardener, with the force employed under him, an additional increase of twenty-five per cent. to the compensation now received by them.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to move an amendment in the eleventh and twelfth lines of the first section. The clause as it now stands reads, "principal executive clerk, $2,100." I move to amend that by striking out the words "twenty-one hundred and sixty" and inserting "three thousand," so as to make the salary $3,000. I believe that the salaries of the principal executive clerk and the principal legislative clerk are the same amount now; but the committee have raised the salary of the principal legislative clerk to $3,000, and have left the salary of the principal executive clerk standing as before upon the ground that there was no corresponding officer in the House. The attempt of the committee was to equalize the salaries of the officers in this branch with the salaries of corresponding officers in the other branch of Congress, but there was no officer in the other branch of Congress corresponding to the executive clerk of the Senate, and therefore they made no alteration. The duties of this officer have very largely increased of late years, probably more than that of any other officer or employe about the Senate. I have been furnished with some data showing this increased labor. In the Thirty-Fifth Congress, the whole number of nominations sent into the Senate was 1,554; in the Thirty-Sixth Congress it was 1,233; in the Thirty-Seventh Congress it was 8,938.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator read that over again?

Mr. POLAND. In the Thirty-Fifth Congress the whole number of nominations was 1,554; in the Thirty-Sixth Congress it was 1,233; in the Thirty-Seventh Congress, 8,938; in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, 7,748; and since the commencement of this session the number of nominations that have been sent in is 7,919, for a part only of one session.

Mr. WADE. This was, so far as we could learn, an anomalous office. There was nothing in the House to compare it to, and of course as we could not equalize it, we left it as it was. The rest of the employes, however, have been raised, by this bill, twenty-five per cent. to make them correspond with the employes of the House generally; and if it is right that the others should be equalized in that way, I have no objection to applying the same principle to this officer.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This amendment would make an increase of more than twenty-five per cent.

Mr. WADE. The amendment may carry it too far. It is not in my mind now what that salary was.

Mr. BROWN. Twenty-one hundred and sixty dollars.

Mr. WADE. Then it ought to be raised by the addition of twenty-five per cent. to make it like the others. That would be the same principle that the rest have gone on. I should say it ought to be about twenty-five hundred dollars. That would be applying to it the same principle as has been applied in the case of the other clerks. Three thousand dollars would be above the gauge which we have gone on with reference to the others.

Mr. POLAND. I inquire of the honorable Senator from Ohio if the salary of the principal legislative clerk is not now $2,160, the same as the principal executive clerk.

Mr. WADE. The principal legislative clerk gets $2,160 now.

Mr. POLAND. And that is raised to $3,000 by this bill?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir.

Mr. POLAND. Why should not the salary of the principal executive clerk be raised to the same extent?

Mr. WADE. We supposed that the chief clerk ought to have a rather higher salary than the others.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He is here at the desk always.

Mr. WADE. He is always at the desk, never leaves it a moment; and frequently has the duties of other officers to perform. We thought we fixed his salary at a sum small enough; but we leave it to the judgment of the Senate. The amount we have named is our judgment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was a little surprised at the statement of my colleague, and I have been looking at the law which fixes the compensation of clerks and other officers of the House of Representatives. I do not find in the law any such compensation as is now proposed to be given to the officers of the Senate. I have the annual estimates here before me, and I see that the appropriation for Clerk of the House of Representatives is $3,600, the same we allow to our Secretary; and for "chief clerk and one assistant clerk $2,160 each." Their legal compensation is $2,160 each.

Mr. WADE. My colleague has probably got the statement prior to the act of the House lately.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, I will make a statement in regard to that. Some years ago, in order to cut off the practice of the two Houses, at the close of the session voting by resolution an extra allowance of twenty per cent. to their clerks and other employes, a law was passed declaring that neither House should in this way increase the compensation of its officers. That is the law. The House of Representatives, three years ago, undertook in violation of the law to increase the pay of the officers of the House. The Senate by an almost unanimous vote contested it, and finally, as a kind of compromise, as the House had committed itself to the payment, after a long discussion, we allowed that appropriation to pass, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, on the express condition inserted in the law, that after that time the thing should not be repeated. Now, they have undertaken at this session, as I understand, to increase the compensation of their employes twenty-five per cent. in violation of two laws, one of which was the result of a compromise; but that resolution of the House will not be regarded by the accounting officers of the Treasury. They have always declared that neither House could raise the compensation of its own employes. It must be done by law. The provision for that twenty-five per cent. increase of compensation of the employes of the House is not a law, nor will any accounting officer allow the money to be paid upon it. It must be sanctioned by a subsequent act of Congress making an appropriation to carry it into effect. That has not been done nor has it been proposed so far as I know. I ask the Senator from Maine if there is any such provision in any of the bills.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. So I thought. The compensation of these officers is fixed by the law as in the statement before me in the estimates.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And that is all the appropriation that is made for them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. In the estimates it will be seen that the clerks are put at $1,800. Under the circumstances, when the proposition was made by my colleague to organize a committee to make the salaries of the officers of the Senate equal to those of the House, I was in favor of it, because in regard to some officers of the Senate there is a deficiency of compensation. For instance, the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of the Senate gets but $2,000, while the same officer of the House gets something more—$2,160, I think. But there is a reason for that. In the House the Sergeant-at-Arms is the disbursing officer of the House. He pays the members their compensation and mileage, while here the Secretary of the Senate does it, or rather we pay a clerk to do it and allow him $480 extra compensation for that service. It seems to me that if we now raise the salaries of the officers of the Senate by a permanent law the House, as a matter of course, will raise the salaries of the officers of the House to equalize them with the Senate, and then we shall have the salaries fixed by this bill permanent perhaps.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Senator if the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate does not discharge the duties of Doorkeeper.

Mr. SHERMAN. But he has a very efficient assistant doorkeeper who is called assistant doorkeeper, but who is really Doorkeeper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is a distinct salary paid to the Doorkeeper, in the House, and another distinct salary to the Sergeant-at-Arms, while here one salary pays the Sergeant-at-Arms for discharging both duties.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not indisposed to give the chief clerk and the principal legislative clerk and the Sergeant-at-Arms fair and liberal compensation—I would say about $3,000. I do not think it is wise now for us to give $2,500 a year to the clerks employed in performing duties about the Senate, when most of their duties are discharged simply during the session of the Senate. If this bill is passed we can no longer refuse the application that is made to raise our own salaries. We cannot refuse to raise any salaries if we raise these to the amount proposed by my colleague.

Nothing in the world is so unpleasant as to attempt to resist or restrain an increase of salaries to those who are around us and associated with us, who are always kind and polite to us, and to whom we are naturally attached; but it seems to me we ought to be prepared for the consequences which must result from this legislation, and we ought to look it fairly in the face. I do not want to say anything more about it. I am willing to give a fair compensation to officers of a permanent character, like the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Secretary of the Senate, and others; but I think this bill is drawn on an erroneous principle. It is drawn on the supposition that the resolution of the House, passed for this session only, is a part of the law of the land, when it is not.

Mr. WADE. I know that heretofore there was a controversy between the House of Representatives and the Senate whether the other branch of Congress could increase the compensation of its own employes. I do not know how that was finally settled. I had a strong opinion about it that perhaps an appropriation for that purpose, like every other appropriation of money, should be fixed by Congress, and not by one branch alone. Notwithstanding, that was done at that time; and the House of Representatives supposed they had power to do what they have done recently, or they would not have done it. I have taken the certificate of the Clerk of the House as to the compensation of their employes. The committee applied to him to furnish us with a statement of the salaries now paid by the House, and we have it here. Senators will find a comparative table at the end of the report in this case. The first row of figures in the table is the pay that the Clerk of the House certifies to us is received by the officers of the House now. I take that as a gauge. I know, however, that that was founded upon the increased compensation that the House, by resolution, had voted, whether valid or not. If it is not valid, and the Senate is determined to treat it as invalid, this whole bill falls to the ground, because it was attempted to equalize the compensation upon that principle. Without that increase it can still be equalized, but the inequality between the two is not very great without that increase. The second row of figures is a statement of the amounts paid by the Senate to its employes. The third column is the difference; and in the fourth column is a statement of the increase proposed to be made by this bill. It equalizes the salaries upon the enhanced payments that the House has agreed to make.

As to our Sergeant-at-Arms, he has a very onerous duty to perform that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House does not have to perform. I think there are three, if not four, officers of the House of Representatives receiving altogether something like seven thousand dollars for the performance of the duty which the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate in his own person performs very much. He makes all the purchases, which keeps him here during the vacation. He will not have any respite at all. In the other House, I believe, that matter is attended to by some one officer, who is charged with that special duty. The Sergeant-at-Arms does it himself, here, and it is a very onerous duty to perform, and he ought to receive compensation for it, in my judgment. At all events we have fixed his compensation at the same sum that is allowed to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives; and so of the rest.

It was not the purpose of the committee to fix what the compensation ought to be, but rather to equalize it with the compensation of corresponding officers in the other House. I am inclined to think that under all the circumstances at present the compensation proposed is too high. I have voted almost always against the enhancement of salaries, but I cannot conceal from myself the fact that the value of money is so much inferior to what it was before the war that gentlemen who live here on these salaries find it pretty hard to get along in the way they are now. I think, perhaps, the increase ought to be made temporary, so that if monetary affairs get to be more satisfactory we may go back to the old compensation. That would be nearer to what it ought to be; but as things are now this increased compensation, in my judgment, will not pay these employes as well as they were paid before the war. I have no idea that the compensation will be as valuable to them, or to anybody else who receives it, under the prices at present prevailing, by reason, perhaps, of the derangement of our currency. In that view I do not think that what this bill proposes to pay is any too much. I think the other House is right. I do not know that the House proceeded legally—my colleague thinks they did not—to enhance the salaries of their employes in this way. But it is the judgment of the House in regard to what they ought to receive, and I agree with the House that it is right. I think the compensation they have fixed for their officers is about right. If what they have done was not authorized by law they will undoubtedly amend this bill, if we pass it, by fixing the like compensation for their employes, and that will remove all the difficulty alleged as to their want of power, and will make it all right.

I do not wish to discuss the question at length whether the compensation now paid is sufficient, or whether the action of the House was legal or not, because, if it was not so it is very easy to make it so, and it is much easier to make it so than to have a controversy on that subject, which would be very disagreeable.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I confess that I do not understand this. There is too much confusion as to the facts, in my judgment, to enable the Senate to act upon it understandingly. The special committee have gone on a basis that they thought was a proper one, and undoubtedly was in the way the matter was referred to them, but they evidently proceeded under a misapprehension of the facts as stated by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] We have made an appropriation this year to pay, according to the estimates, the clerks and employes of the House of Representatives. The estimates were not at all according to the ratio now stated; and it is true, as the honorable Senator from Ohio has said, that if the House of Representatives has passed a resolution to add twenty-five per cent. to the compensation of their employes, it cannot be paid and allowed on settlement by the accounting officers. The compensation is regulated by a law of Congress, and one House cannot change it without the other.

Now, sir, with regard to this matter generally, if there are any officers whose compensation ought to be increased decidedly because it is permanently insufficient, I am perfectly willing to provide for such cases. For instance, I am willing to allow our chief clerk $3,000, but not $3,200 simply because the twenty-five per cent. added to the compensation of the corresponding officer in the House of Representatives is supposed to bring it up to that amount. I think, also, that the principal legislative clerk, who now has $2,160, ought to have $2,500; and I think that the Sergeant-at-Arms, who now gets $2,160, ought to have $2,500; and the committee propose to allow him a clerk in addition. That is a new office. A clerk is allowed in the House of Representatives simply because the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House is the disbursing officer and keeps accounts, and must necessarily do it. Our Sergeant-at-Arms makes some purchases and performs extra duties, but he does not perform the duties of a disbursing officer because those are performed by another, whom we pay.

There is one thing in this bill that in my judgment is decidedly wrong. It allows to the "keeper of the stationery" $2,500, and then a new office is created by it of messenger in the stationery-room at $1,500. Just look and see how that is managed. Here is a clerk, or a messenger, or whatever you please to call him, who has charge of the stationery, whom you never see in the stationery-room. I never saw him there in my life, and I guess no other Senator ever saw him there. He, under this bill, having charge of that room nominally, is to have $2,500. He makes the purchases of stationery; he provides it; he is called "the keeper of the stationery;" and instead of keeping it, we appoint a messenger in the stationery-room at $1,500 to do all the work of dealing out the stationery to Senators and keeping the accounts. Then in fact we are to allow a keeper of the stationery $2,500 a year for nothing in the world except making the purchases of the stationery necessary, and I suppose he may be considered as supervising it, but we employ a messenger in addition at $1,500 in order to take care of the stationery. There is $4,000 for that.

Mr. WADE. It is the same in the House. Mr. FESSENDEN. But the amount of stationery in the House must be vastly greater, and there are so many more persons to be waited upon that undoubtedly it may be necessary to have a messenger there, but it is not necessary here. One man can do the whole, and one man did the whole for a long period of years until this proposed increase. Mr. Clubb, who was in that room for many years, never had a clerk or messenger, and never called for one. He did the whole work and did it well for a series of years. Now we are to add $1,500 for a messenger to stay there and do the work and wait upon us while the "keeper" himself is to be allowed $2,500. There is no reason for it in the world. If the keeper of the stationery chooses to employ himself about other business and puts somebody else in there to be paid, one of the messengers to the Senate in reality, I think he should pay that person out of his own pocket. We allow enough to the keeper of the stationery to perform all the duties for the small number of Senators there are here. While I am on that subject, I will say that I really wish that the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate would turn their attention to the stationery-room and put it under some regulation. Nothing in my judgment is more necessary; nothing calls for reform here in the Senate more than that stationery-room. It has got to be an abuse in my judgment, and a very serious one, and this is adding to it.

I notice in the table appended to the report the last item is "messengers," and the table shows that our messengers are now paid $1,200, and it proposes to pay them $1,500, and that is put down as an addition of $300. I suppose there are twenty or twenty-five of them, and each one is raised $300. The number of messengers is not put down, and instead of this item being an additional expense of $300 only, as the report would seem to show, we are at $300 additional expense for every messenger we have got connected with the Senate. We have increased the number very much since we came to the new Hall, with a larger gallery; and the Sergeant-at-Arms has been obliged to add to them now and again.

I think this bill needs careful revision. It is leaping in the dark in the first place, on the supposition, taking it for granted, which, I take it, is not the fact as the law stands, and cannot be, that the officers of the House receive all that is fixed by a vote of the House, and that therefore we must come up to that by law. If we do, the result will be that the House will add the increased salary for their employes as an amendment to the bill, and then this very large increase of compensation all around will take place.

Whatever officers there may be here in the Senate connected with us ought to be well and properly paid. I think there are some whose salaries ought to be raised; but I think those whose salaries ought to be raised are those who do the great work of the Senate, and have great responsibilities, and whose salaries have been kept too low. With regard to the others generally, I have not heard any complaint until this effort on the part of the House, which resulted one year in compelling the Senate to yield to it in order to pass a bill, if I recollect aright, and is now attempted again. I think it would be better to refer this bill to the Committee on Contingent Expenses on the part of the Senate. I do not know whether the Senator who has charge of the bill will object to that or not.

Mr. WADE. I have no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it should be properly revised and looked into, that we may see what the facts and the law are on the subject. I therefore move that this bill be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have taken no part in this matter, and am not particularly advised as to the amount the salaries are proposed to be raised; but I submit to the Senator from Maine that when the Senate has appointed a special committee for the particular object of looking into this matter and they have made a report upon it—the only object for which the committee were raised—now to take it from that committee and submit it to one of the standing committees of the Senate is not treating the special committee respectfully.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not mean that. I turned around to the Senator from Ohio before I made the motion and asked him if he had any objection to it, and he said he had no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose his delicacy would not allow him to object. If the bill is to be recommitted, I think it had better be to the same committee that reported it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] was a member of the committee that reported this bill, and he says he is in favor of referring it to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I am perfectly willing to recommit it to the same committee; but it ought to go to some committee. I think it has gone on a misapprehension of facts.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I only suggest to the Senator from Maine that, where a special committee is raised for a particular object and they make a report upon it, to take their report and submit it to a standing committee, looks to me to be a singular proceeding.

Mr. WADE. I have no feeling of delicacy about it. I do not care where the bill goes. I know, however, that under the resolution under which we acted, any committee will have to come to the same conclusion at which we arrived. It was not in our power to say whether these salaries were too high or too low. The bill is based upon the enhanced compensation that the House of Representatives propose to pay their employés. Gentlemen say that that body was not authorized to make that increase and that it will never be paid, and therefore the bill should be amended in that particular, and an equalization made without reference to that proposed increase. If, however, the resolution under which this committee acted is to stand as an instruction, any other committee that considers the subject must come to the same conclusion that we did. If you wish some other basis of compensation adopted, you should give the committee a discretion to fix the compensation as they think it ought to be, or you ought to instruct them to equalize it on the same basis that the respective employés stood before the House resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The difference is, that I propose to equalize with what they are entitled to by law, and not to equalize with what the House tries to give.

Mr. WILSON. I think that the bill should go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. WADE. I have no objection to its going to that committee, but I am entirely satisfied that we ought to enhance the compensation of these officers. That I have no doubt about. The committee, in making this report, had no discretion. The rule for them to follow was prescribed in the resolution under which they were appointed. Take the Sergeant-at-Arms; his office is an exceedingly laborious one; he stays here through the whole vacation, and he has very responsible duties to perform during all that time, for he makes all the purchases for the department of the business to which he attends. His duties keep him here in the vacation; he cannot spend it away from here, as can be done by the corresponding officer of the House. But I shall not resist the motion to refer the bill to a standing committee, and let them fix the compensation as they think it ought to be.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will simply suggest that in referring this bill to either committee they should be relieved from the instructions referred to by my colleague, and it should be committed with instructions to report back a bill prescribing a fair and just compensation to the officers of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is what I intended in making the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would relieve the committee from the instructions of the original resolutions because they may bind them to the scale in this bill, perhaps.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to say, as I happen to be one of the members of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, that this subject has been under consideration, and the chairman was about to report a bill creating a new officer which they recommend to the adoption of the Senate, who shall be the purchasing agent for the Senate, to supply such things as may be necessary for the transaction of our business. As things now are, there are not less than four or five different persons who buy the same description of articles of different parties and at different prices, at the same time. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] was kind enough to postpone this bill one day in order to enable the suggestions of the Committee on Contingent Expenses to be prepared to be incorporated into his bill, but they have not been able yet to prepare their report. If, however, the bill goes over, or is recommitted to the same committee, or is sent to another committee, or lies on the table for a day, I think they will be prepared to make some suggestions in that direction.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the bill will be sent to the Committee on Contingent Expenses without instructions. I understand that committee have considered the subject pretty carefully.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Before the measure is re-committed, I desire to propose an amendment to come in at the end of the last line on page 2 of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that there is an amendment already pending, but a motion to commit takes precedence of the amendment. An amendment, however, can be received by unanimous consent if the Senator desires it to go to the committee with the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I ask leave to present an amendment to have it printed and referred to the committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That can be done after the vote is taken on the commitment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment can be received by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOWE. I desire that my amendment may be printed and go to the committee.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire the same order to be made in regard to my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and those orders are made. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to refer the bill to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIDGES ON THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate now proceed to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 186) to authorize the construction of certain bridges and to establish them as post roads.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom the House amendments were referred, report in favor of concurring in the House amendments with an amendment. The amendment of the committee will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to add to the House amendments the following additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That the St. Louis and Illinois Bridge Company, a corporation organized under an act of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, approved February 5, 1864, and an act amendatory of the same, approved February 20, 1865, and also confined in its corporate powers under an act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, approved —, 1864, or any other bridge company organized under the laws of Missouri and Illinois, be, and the same is hereby, empowered to erect, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi river between the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, and the city of East St. Louis, in the State of Illinois, subject to all the conditions contained in said act of incorporation and amendment thereto and not inconsistent with the following terms and provisions contained in this act: and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said waters the cause may be tried before the district court of the United States of any State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

And be it further enacted, That the bridge hereby authorized in the preceding section to be built shall not be a suspension bridge or draw-bridge with a pivot or other form of draw, but shall be constructed of continuous or unbroken spans, and subject to these conditions, namely, first, that the lowest part of the bridge at the bottom chord shall not be less than fifty feet above the city directrix at its greatest span; second, that it shall have at least one span five hundred feet in the clear or two spans three hundred and fifty feet in the clear of abutments; if the two latter spans are used, the one over the main steamboat channel shall be fifty feet above the city directrix measured to the lowest part of the bridge at the center of the span; third, no span over the water at low-water mark shall be less than two hundred feet in the clear of abutments.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know exactly at what stage to offer it, but I desire to offer an amendment to the House amendments. The bill is in this condition: it is a Senate bill which was amended in the House of Representatives, came back, was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and we are now considering an amendment which they report to the House amendments.

Mr. CONNESS. Let that be acted on first.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to offer another amendment to one of the House amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That can be done after the amendment reported by the committee shall have been disposed of. The question now is on that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Section eight of the House amendments provides for a bridge at Keokuk, to be built by a corporation which has been chartered in Iowa. All the other bridges, it will be seen, are to be built under the authority of the two States on the opposite sides of the Mississippi river. I wish to amend that amendment so as to have the authority of Illinois as well as of Iowa for the construction of that bridge. There will be no objection to it, I presume. I move to amend the eighth section of the House amendments by inserting after the word "company," in line three of section eight, the words "a corporation existing under the law of the State of Iowa, and the Hancock County, Illinois, Bridge Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Illinois;" and then to strike out the word "is" and insert "are," so that this section of the House amendments, if thus amended, will read:

That the Keokuk and Hamilton, Mississippi, Bridge Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Iowa, and the Hancock County, Illinois, Bridge Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Illinois, be, and are hereby, empowered to construct and maintain a bridge over the Mississippi river between Keokuk, Iowa, and Hamilton, Illinois, of the same character, description, and construction as provided in this act for the bridges at Quincy and Burlington.

The only effect of my amendment is this: the bill as it came from the other House authorized a company chartered in the State of Iowa to erect the bridge; I think it ought to say, "and the company chartered by the State of Illinois." It is so in regard to all the others.

Mr. HOWE. It seems to me the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is to authorize two distinct companies to do precisely the same thing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is to do one thing, but subject to the laws of both States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. These two companies have to do it together. That is so in reference to all the bridges which are authorized by this act.

Mr. HOWE. I understand the other provisions of the bill to empower single companies, when authorized so to do by the adjacent States, to build bridges; but this authorizes two distinct companies to do the same thing.

Mr. RAMSEY. To build one bridge.

Mr. HOWE. It seems to me there must be a conflict of jurisdiction.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Wisconsin will look at the fifth section of the bill he will see that the same provision is there made. That section, in regard to the bridge to be built at Hannibal, provides "that a bridge may be constructed at the town of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri, across the Mississippi river, so as to connect the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad with the Pike County and Great Western railroads of Illinois, on the same terms, and subject to the same restrictions," &c. Who is to build that bridge? Of course those railroad companies are to build it; the Great Western road on the Illinois side, and the Hannibal and St. Joseph road on the Missouri side.

Mr. HOWE. It does not say so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It does not say that they shall build it, but it says a bridge may be built so as to connect those roads, and of course no third parties will come in there to build the bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I send to the Chair a further amendment to the House amendments.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That any bridge company, being organized under the laws of the States of Missouri and Illinois, be, and the same is hereby, empowered to construct, maintain, and operate a submerged iron tubular bridge across the Mississippi river, between the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, and the city of East St. Louis, in the State of Illinois, subject to all the conditions contained in said act of incorporation, and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act. And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said waters, the cause may be tried before the district court of the United States of any State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

And be it further enacted, That any bridge built under the provisions of the preceding section shall be tubular in construction, and sunk below the bed of said river, so that the top of said structure shall be below the lowest water line of the Mississippi river, and so that the same shall in no wise interfere with or obstruct navigation when completed, or prevent a safe and expeditious transit for all classes of vessels upon said river during construction.

And be it further enacted, That any bridge erected under the provisions of this act shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, than the rate per mile which the railroad companies terminating at either end receive for such service.

Mr. BROWN. Gentlemen around me seem to desire more time to investigate that subject than will probably be permissible at the present time; and as there is a bill covering the same subject-matter before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, I will, at their instance, withdraw the amendment in question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn. The question is on concurring in the amendments of the House of Representatives, as amended.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that we proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 408.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to reconsider the vote just taken. I intended to offer an amendment to the House amendments before they were disposed of, rather an important amendment, I think. The Chair decided that the House amendments were concurred in before I could rise. I desire that that vote shall be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the reconsideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we shall not reconsider until we see what the amendment is. The Senator can enter his motion to reconsider, and then let us hear what his proposition is.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose I could call for a division any way, but the Senator from Kansas sprang to his feet the very moment the Chair decided, giving me no opportunity to call for a division before he rose to his feet and addressed the Chair.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly the Senator from Missouri had a right to call for a division at any time when the matter was pending; but I presume he was not observing that the bill passed. The concurring in the House amendments was the end of it. Some little time intervened before another subject was called up. If the Senator will submit his amendment and let us see what it is, perhaps there will be no objection to the reconsideration.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I rose as soon as I could, but the Senator from Kansas was already on his feet.

Mr. BROWN. I think a reconsideration is a courtesy which ought to be extended to my colleague under the circumstances.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the vote will be reconsidered, and then I can offer my amendment.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on concurring in the House amendments as amended.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to offer this amendment to come in at the end of the seventh section of the House amendments, as a proviso:

Provided, That if the board of engineers authorized under the laws of the United States, approved at the present session of Congress, to examine the Mississippi river and make report on the subject of bridge construction thereon, shall find, and so report, that elevated bridges of continuous spans can be constructed and operated without greater expense to the company building them than draw-bridges, and with less obstruction to navigation, then no draw-bridge shall be commenced or constructed under this act.

Mr. GRIMES. I raise a question of order as to the admissibility of that amendment at this stage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no question on the point of order. The amendment is admissible.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is a proviso to a House amendment. It is not to touch the original bill. This bill for bridging the Mississippi river was introduced here about the middle of the session, and was called up one morning and forced through this body without giving me much of an opportunity, as I thought, of discussing the question. The same question afterward came up upon a bill of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. NORTON,] and I then took occasion to discuss it much more fully. It has ever been my impression that if the Senate had considered it as they ought to have considered it, no bridge bill would have been passed at this session of Congress.

At a subsequent period the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads reported an amendment to the river and harbor appropriation bill, requiring the Secretary of War to appoint a commission of engineers to go out and examine the Mississippi river, and to report to Congress at the next session the character of the structures that ought to be built upon that river. If there was any meaning in that, it was this, and nothing else, that no bridge ought to be constructed upon that river that shall be planned by Congress without some scientific investigation of the subject.

Now, what do we know about bridges? I suppose I know as much about bridges as most of the Senators around me, and yet what do I know about them? We assume, we have assumed by the passage of this bill, to permit individuals after nearly a hundred years of this Government had elapsed without such a proposition having been made before, to go and construct upon the Mississippi river not less than seven bridges, low structures, not over twelve feet above the surface of the water. It has never been done before, and we have had, I say, nearly a century of the Government; but never until this session of Congress was a proposition made here to bridge the Mississippi river with a bridge of this character. I know that a bridge is constructed across the Mississippi river at Rock Island, but not by authority of Congress; and what has been the consequence? Ever since its construction it has been a source of annoyance; a source of destruction to property, a source of contention; and it is a bridge which in my honest judgment will in the course of a few years be declared a nuisance and taken down.

We now assume by this bill to put seven structures, not over twelve feet high above the water, across the Mississippi river. I desire to say, once for all, because I do not wish to take up the time of this body, that I have offered an amendment which if the Senate do not intend to obstruct unnecessarily the navigation of that great river they will adopt. Before I consider the amendment, let me ask how would the Senators from New York take a proposition to bridge the Hudson river with pontoon bridges. How would they receive a proposition in this body to put these low structures across the Hudson river? How would the city of New York receive a proposition to bridge the East river between that city and Brooklyn? Such a bridge could be constructed with a draw in it that would enable the constructor of the bridge to make millions, and millions of dollars in the course of a few years. Let me ask the Senator from Illinois, who is urging on us the construction of these bridges across the Mississippi river, how he would take a proposition to bridge the great stream passing by Chicago with a low pontoon bridge.

The Senator from Illinois the other day urged upon this body the passage of a bill for the construction of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara. Why? In order to have an unobstructed passage to the Atlantic ocean; and yet he, living at Chicago, while he wants the great St. Lawrence river to be entirely open to the ocean, proposes to put seven structures upon the Mississippi river in the way of the navigation of that great stream. How would the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] receive a proposition to throw a bridge across from Detroit to Windsor, a low bridge through which the commerce of the St. Lawrence and the great lakes should pass? How would a proposition to bridge the St. Clair river be received? How would a proposition to bridge any of the streams connecting the great lakes of the West be received? You could not pass such a proposition through this body; but it would be just as reasonable and just as sensible as to pass this proposition.

Mr. President, the great farming interests of this country are not represented here; I mean to say they are not represented by lobby influence outside; of course they are represented here by Senators. We know that gentlemen, representatives of railroad influence, representatives of private interests, have been here urging the passage of these bills during this whole session of Congress. I have said to them, "Gentlemen, put up elevated bridges with a span of three hundred feet, and I am perfectly willing that you may bridge this great stream; I will not object if you will give us three hundred feet spans and elevated bridges, under which the steamboats can pass with ease, and do not require these bridges to be built immediately upon the surface of the water." I have been answered that it must be put through for the accommodation of the railroads, and nothing else, because everybody knows that such bridges as I have described can be built on the Mississippi very well. A proposition is now made by a scientific gentleman, indorsed by seven or eight of the best engineers in this country, to put iron tubular bridges across the Mississippi, which it is said can be put there undoubtedly, without obstruction to the navigation of the stream; and yet Congress seems disposed to press forward this thing and to give us nothing but these low bridges.

Mr. President, I think that inasmuch as we have provided for the appointment of a commission of competent and able engineers to go there and examine this subject, we ought at least to be willing to receive their report before we undertake to decide this great question for ourselves. Why is it that these elevated bridges cannot do? Why can they not be built? They have been built elsewhere. Why can they not be constructed here? Simply because it will cost the railroads a little money in order to throw up ground upon one side. That is all. Then let them build bridges where there are elevated banks on each side of the stream, and not let us undertake to decide this great question for ourselves, we not being scientific men, but let us take the report of these engineers.

Now, Mr. President, if the Senate will listen to me while I explain this amendment, I think they will certainly adopt it. If you do not adopt this amendment it is a declaration that you intend unnecessarily to obstruct the navigation of the river. I only provide in this amendment that if the board of engineers authorized under the laws which you yourselves have passed at this session to examine the Mississippi river and make report on the subject of bridge construction thereon, shall find, and so report, that elevated bridges with continuous spans can be constructed and operated without greater expense—I do not say equal expense, but without greater expense—to the companies building them than draw-bridges, and with less obstruction to navigation, then no draw-bridge shall be commenced or constructed under this act.

Is not that as fair as could be asked by the companies? What else can the railroad companies of this country ask? If they can put elevated bridges there without greater cost than these low bridges, and they are no greater obstruction to navigation, why, I ask, shall they not put up elevated bridges? If the Senate vote down that proposition, I understand the Senate to say that they are not consulting even the interests of the railroad companies, but that they intend to block up that river and to obstruct its navigation, whether it costs the railroad companies any more money or not; that, irrespective and regardless of the best interests of navigation, or even the interests of the railroad companies themselves, they will put structures there that will in all time clog and hinder navigation upon that stream.

If they can build these elevated bridges—and all the navigation interest say so—with no more than equal expense to themselves, and they are no greater obstruction to navigation, then in the name of sense why not do it? Who is ready to go on with a low bridge this summer? We shall meet again in the course of a few months. Our navigation interests are clamoring against it. None of you would vote to clog up the navigable streams between the great lakes. None of you would put such a bridge across them. Then why do you do it on the Mississippi river?

Mr. President, I say that this act ought not to be done, and I appeal to the Senate, at least if they are determined to pass the bill, to say that if the railroad companies can build elevated bridges without greater expense to themselves and without greater obstruction to the navigation of the river, they shall be required to do it. Is there anything unjust in that? Surely not. If this amendment is voted down I shall forever hereafter understand that the Senate have intentionally obstructed the navigation of this stream, that they so design, for the benefit of the railroad companies of the country, or for the purpose of changing the course of trade and business.

Mr. YATES. I have but a very few words to say on this subject. I am somewhat surprised at the course taken by the Senator from Missouri; indeed his position is a very strange one. I live in a State bordering upon the Mississippi; the Mississippi runs some four hundred miles, if I mistake not, along its border. I represent an agricultural State, perhaps one of the greatest agricultural States. We are very much interested in the navigation of the Mississippi. There are thirteen States upon the banks of the Mississippi which are interested in the navigation of the river, containing ten million people with all their commerce. We propose not to obstruct the navigation of the Mississippi by any means whatever. We believe that the people of this country can enjoy not only the navigation of the Mississippi but also can have railroad transportation and railroad facilities. Why, sir, the transportation, the travel, the freight by railroad is incalculably more than that down the Mississippi river. The travel and trade of this country are not North and South; they are East and West. Railroads from all over the eastern States cross the Mississippi at various points, doing an immense trade, carrying on an immense travel. Railroads are the highways of the people nowadays; we travel by them almost altogether. It is no use at this late day to try and make water transportation rival transportation by railroad.

We are not proposing to obstruct the navigation of the Mississippi, but this trade and travel must have an outlet West. The people of northern Missouri must have an outlet to the East and they must have an outlet from the West. The people of the State of Illinois must have the same facilities. The people of the whole land are interested in the construction of these bridges. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is simply to postpone and retard progress in the right direction. I would not object to his amendment, but would let his amendment be adopted, if it were not applicable to the construction of the present bridges authorized by the bill. Let him have his investigation in regard to his submarine bridges; but the commerce and trade of this country now demand some means of crossing the Mississippi river. Why, sir, look at the obstructions there are now in getting across the Mississippi river from the various points where railroads terminate on the East and on the West, the obstructions which are occasioned by having to ferry that river. At some seasons of the year it cannot be ferried; the water is either too low or the river is frozen over. Must all this trade, must all this commerce, must all these highways of the people be stopped simply to gratify interests which are immediately situated upon the line of the river? The people of Quincy, the people of Burlington, the people living in the cities along the Mississippi river, Hannibal, Palmyra, and all those points, are just as much interested in the construction of these bridges as they are in the navigation of the Mississippi river. They are equally interested in each.

We propose not to obstruct the Mississippi river in any particular whatever. I admit, with the Senator from Missouri, that we should not obstruct the Mississippi river, but I do not admit that because these railroads are prosecuted by private capital therefore the railroad companies will necessarily build defective bridges. Bridges have been constructed all over the United States by private enterprise and private capital. If men are here from various parts of the West or the East, from St. Louis, or elsewhere, to try to lobby measures through Congress, how can we help it? Men must come here to present their applications before Congress, to explain their propositions, and have them understood.

It is necessary now that these bridges should be constructed to meet the demands of commerce; to meet the requirements of business, of trade, and of travel now. We cannot wait for the investigations that are proposed by the Senator from Missouri. I hope his amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Sherman, Sprague, Van Winkle, and Willey—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Grimes, Howard, Kirkwood, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Riddle, Sumner, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Stewart, Wade, Williams, and Wright—16.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments of the House of Representatives as amended.

Mr. HENDERSON. I now move to amend by adding at the end of the seventh section of the House amendments these words:

And it is hereby further provided that no draw-bridges shall be constructed or commenced under the provisions of this act before the 1st day of March, 1867.

The effect of this amendment will be to delay the construction of these draw-bridges until we can get a report from this commission. I appeal to the Senate once more not to force upon us on the Mississippi river the construction of these bridges. I do think, and I make this as a last appeal, that it is an infliction which ought not to be made by Congress. There is no necessity for the immediate construction of these draw-bridges. Nobody is ready to go on with the work, and even if the companies were ready the river is too high for them to progress with it. We have provided for the appointment of a commission to go there and examine the river. Suppose that commission should report that these draw-bridges ought not to be constructed, but that elevated bridges, in the language of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. GUTHRIE] the other day, are the best for the railroads and the best for the river. Why not adjourn the matter until we can hear from that board? Immediately after we convene at the next session Congress can take the subject up and go on; or in fact if this amendment be adopted, and no further legislation is had, of course, after the 1st of March next, the companies can proceed with the construction of these draw-bridges. But I do not desire parties to come in here at the beginning of the next session of Congress, when we propose to repeal this bill, after the board shall have said that these bridges ought not to be constructed, and tell us that they have expended large sums of money, and that if we repeal the law it will ruin them, and they must be compensated for the damages to which we subject them by the repeal of the law. I want to avoid that difficulty.

I appeal to Senators, and ask them if it is possible, were all the States in the Union represented here to-day, that any such bill as this could be passed. Do they believe this low-bridge bill could be passed provided the southern States were represented on this floor? Senators know that if Tennessee and Arkansas and two or three other States lying below them on the Mississippi river were represented here no such bridge bill as this could be passed; and why? Because they would understand the necessities of the commerce of the river. Senators must not misunderstand my argument on this point. It is a legitimate and proper argument. This is a great thoroughfare. It is one that passes, as the Senator from Illinois said, through many States. We ought not now, for the first time in the history of this Government, to go on to build bridges upon our own judgment of what is right and proper. We know nothing about the construction of bridges. If we do, there was no necessity for our directing the Secretary of War to send a commission there to examine the subject. What did you send them for? If we are to be the judges, what the necessity of sending a board to examine? If we know better than we will know after they have reported, why send them? Why provide for a report by them and yet go on and construct the bridges?

There is no intent on my part to stop the construction of bridges, as was intimated by the Senator from Illinois. If iron submerged bridges can be built, they are infinitely better, and it answers the objection made by the railroad companies that if we require them to go over elevated bridges their depots must be on high ground and they cannot get down to the surface of the water in order to put part of their freight on board of steamboats. Of course iron submerged bridges can be built so as to enable them to come to the surface of the water. But I undertake to say, and the Senator from Kentucky demonstrated the other day beyond any doubt, that the elevated bridge is preferable to a draw-bridge both for the railroad interest and for the navigation interest. That Senator is a practical railroad man with large experience on this subject; and referring to the bridge at Nashville on his road he said that if he had to build it over again he would make it an elevated bridge as preferable for the railroad company and preferable for the navigation interest.

This amendment will not prevent the construction of any other sort of bridges across the Mississippi river except these low bridges twelve feet above the surface of the water. You are proposing by this bill to construct seven of those bridges across this river. I appeal to the Senate once more, by all means to postpone at least the construction of this character of bridge until we can hear from this commission.

I alluded to the representation of the southern States. If the southern States are represented again in the Congress of the United States, if these bridges are put across the river, they will have to come down. Mark what I tell you. I predict to-day that these bridges will not be permitted to stand if Congress hereafter can vote them down, because they will prove an obstruction to the Mississippi river. I am satisfied of it. I am just as thoroughly satisfied that they will obstruct the navigation of that river, and do it with great detriment to commerce, as I am that I am standing here now. I proposed that if the railroad companies can build any other sort than these with no more cost to themselves, then they shall not construct these bridges. The Senate said "no." Now I ask that we postpone the matter until we can hear from the commission. The elevated bridge will answer for railroad purposes just as well as any other; but I will tell you what cannot be built. A bridge across the Mississippi river cannot be built for private interests so well. The companies authorized in this bill are to go on and build bridges for private travel across the river, to make them toll bridges and receive toll for wagons, carts, horses, and mules that cross it; and that is the reason why it is proposed to put them immediately down upon the surface of the water, regardless of the great interests of navigation. If you consult the railroad interest only, I believe with the Senator from Kentucky, who said that an elevated bridge can be built best for the railroad and best for the river; but I know that you do not consult private interests so much by causing them to do it because then they have to build embankments upon one side of the river perhaps, unless they happen to get a place on the river where the banks are high on each side.

Now, Mr. President, I leave this matter and appeal to gentlemen once more to let us have the report of the board before inflicting upon us these low bridges.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri has told us that the agricultural interests of the country are not represented here on this question. I think he is correct in that. So far as I know, there has been no representation from that body of our population except as their sentiments are reflected by the members of the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I said in the lobby.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand what the Senator said: that there has been no representation of the agricultural interest in the "lobby," if he prefers that I should use that word. I think he is correct. I think there has been no representation on the part of the body of that population here except by the members of the Senate. They have not been so fortunate as the commercial interest. The commercial interest have been represented. If I have not been misinformed, the Chamber of Commerce of the city of St. Louis, representing that very large emporium of commerce in the State which the Senator has the honor in part to represent on this floor, has been represented by a very distinguished and numerous committee, opposing to the utmost of their power the passage of any bills which would allow the Mississippi river to be bridged except upon some plan which, in the estimation of every practical engineer who is familiar with the topography of the country, is totally impracticable.

Mr. President, I think I represent the agricultural interests of my State when I vote—not for the benefit of a particular railroad corporation, but for the benefit of the universal commerce of the Northwest—that there shall be bridges across the Mississippi river, not constructed in such a way that they can by any possibility obstruct the navigation, but so as to promote the interests of commerce crossing the river, as well as that passing up and down that stream. I live on the bank of the Mississippi river. There is a railroad approaching the river at that point from Chicago, and another one going out from that point one hundred miles into the interior. I live in a wheat country. That is one of the staple productions of that region. However valuable and rich, in a commercial point of view, St. Louis may be, yet Chicago, which is to-day and I think ever will be the great wheat market of the continent, is the point to which we desire to send our wheat. Let me say to the Senator that it is the estimate of everybody in the town where I live—and they have had considerable experience on the subject—that there is a loss of seven bushels upon every car-load that is transferred across the Mississippi river according to the present plan, which, at the present price of wheat, in the neighborhood of two dollars a bushel, is fourteen dollars of a loss on a car-load that is sustained by the agricultural interest. It is that interest that demands the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi river in order that such a loss may be obviated. It is the interest not only of the producer of the wheat that such a loss should not be sustained, but it is also the interest of the consumer in the East.

But, Mr. President, I rose principally to correct the statement of fact made by the Senator, in which he said that none of the companies authorized by this bill to construct these bridges were prepared to go on. I undertake to say that two of them are ready to go on.

Mr. HENDERSON. Why cannot they go on just as well under my amendment?

Mr. GRIMES. Because bridges fifty feet high are utterly impracticable. Every man who is familiar with the low alluvial bottoms of the Mississippi river, where, in some cases, as in the case where I live, it is eight miles from the bank of the Mississippi river to the bluff, and on the adjacent side, in the town where I live, the surrounding level is not more than ten or twelve feet above the water—every man knows it is utterly impossible to get the elevation required without utterly destroying the town at the foot of the bank. The Senator's amendment that he proposed a little while ago provided that they should investigate the question as to what might be the extra expenditures in the construction of such a bridge; but there was no provision in it requiring them to determine how much might be the loss sustained by the people owning property adjacent to it by having an embankment thrown up fifty or sixty feet to cover the level of the ground where their buildings stand.

Mr. COWAN. Why put the bridge at the town?

Mr. GRIMES. That inquiry shows that the Senator from Pennsylvania knows nothing about the topography of the country. The towns are where the roads are required to connect. You have in some instances either got to put the bridge at the town, or else you have got to attain with the rise of the road an elevation of two hundred feet to get on the top of the bluff. Let me state to the Senator something of the topography of that country. At the towns on the one side, in all instances in the State of Iowa save one, there is on one side or the other of the river a low alluvial bottom from one to eight miles wide. Occasionally a bluff is pushed out to the stream, sometimes almost perpendicular. Through this bluff a small creek has forced its way. Adjoining, and on the sides of that small stream and spreading out where it empties into the Mississippi will be a piece of what is known as bottom land, what in some other portions of the country would be denominated interval lands. On this low bottom land is situated the town, with precipitous bluffs above and below on the river, and quite steep bluffs on the crest. That is the case with several of the towns. The railroads are built following up the stream from the river. To get the required elevation of fifty feet you have to bury up, in some instances, the whole village or city where you propose to cross. In the city of Quincy, where they propose to build one of these bridges, there is a bluff that approaches the river, and I am not prepared to say that they could not, on one side there, secure a proper elevation.

Mr. COWAN. Where are the towns situated?

Mr. GRIMES. Generally on the bank of the streams that empty into the Mississippi, and on the low alluvial land on the bank of the Mississippi. Therefore I say that in nearly each one of these instances, certainly in the one with which I am more familiar than any other, in the town where I live, the whole town would be nearly if not quite ruined by an attempt to build a railroad through it with an embankment fifty feet high. And such an embankment would be necessary if the bridge was required to be fifty feet above high-water mark.

Take the case at Keokuk. There is a provision authorizing the construction of a bridge at Keokuk. You have got to build it according to this provision or else you have got to elevate it I should suppose two hundred and fifty feet in order to strike near the top of the bluff.

Mr. HENDERSON. At both sides?

Mr. GRIMES. They have a bluff two miles or so on the opposite side, at Hamilton. The Senator would not suppose that they were going to build a bridge the whole distance from Hamilton on the opposite side to Keokuk.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let me ask the Senator if he is not aware that the Great Pedee and the Santee rivers and various others in the southern States have trestle-work and embankments thrown up for ten or fifteen miles across bottom lands.

Mr. GRIMES. I never was on the Santee or the Pedee.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have crossed them, and I know such to be the fact. The Senator knows very well that these streams have on each side very wide bottoms, and when the streams rise, the water flows over them to the depth of some ten or fifteen feet, and trestles and embankments are thrown up over them, and causeways left for the water to pass through. This idea of submerging a town is a new idea to me.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, the illustration drawn from the Santee and the Pedee strikes me as rather far-fetched. I never traveled in that country, but a friend of mine who did travel there told me that he passed over one of those trestle-works, and he said that he noticed that it was rickety and jarring very much as they passed. He looked down and found on each side negroes standing below with handspikes against the trestles trying to hold the roadway up and keep it steady. [Laughter.] I do hope we shall not have our railroads, under the direction and influence of the Senator from Missouri, built upon any such system as that.

Mr. President, the proposition is simply one to postpone and prevent the construction of these bridges.

The Senator appeals to us to refuse to make these bridges, because the South is not represented. I apprehend that if the southern States were represented we should find some of their representatives a little more liberal on this subject than some of the members here now—men who would be willing that commerce should seek its legitimate channel, no matter in what direction it might go. If there is anybody here who is interested in the navigation of the Mississippi river, then I am. I believe I ought to be as much interested as any man. I have lived on its banks for thirty years. The prosperity of the town I live in and my own has been intimately connected with it. I would do nothing to impair it. But we must have bridges; commerce must be permitted to seek its most profitable direction. We want to maintain both lines of commerce, by the river and by rail without breaking bulk. We are entirely satisfied, as the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, that the construction of a bridge with a draw one hundred and sixty feet wide, forty feet wider than the two bridges now built across the Mississippi river, will be ample. If found to be otherwise we will cause them to be removed, as can be done under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. COWAN. I have no very great disposition to interfere in this matter, but I must confess that the honorable Senator from Iowa, with all his exact knowledge of the country, did not make the engineering difficulties very clear to me after all, about elevating this bridge sufficiently above the water to save the river. That is the question. The only question is, whether you had not better now at this time put in more money and make your bridge higher so as to save the river. Can that be done? If there are eight miles of the bottom, and the town should be built upon that bottom, there is certainly room enough for a railroad company to get around the town with its embankment in order to cross the river. If, on the other hand, the town is built on the bluff, as I understand it is at times on either side, then there is no necessity for the embankment there, because the bluff itself is high enough to give them the start from there. What I mean to say is that I have a very clear and distinct opinion that the river there is more valuable as a highway than any other improvement, not even excepting railroads, that could be devised, and I think it would be the interest of all the people living along it that it should be saved from any obstructions of bridges or anything else.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I do not think that any one can accuse me of being hostile to railroad interests, for I believe that I introduced the first bill that was introduced into this body for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi river; and I did it with the full understanding that the time had come when it was necessary to have continuous lines of transit across that river. In that bill there was a provision taken from the law of Congress which was on our statute-books providing, in the alternate, for the construction of bridges with continuous spans or else draw-bridges. When that bill was sent out to the West and was published in the newspapers there, it elicited a great deal of discussion; and I think I am safe in saying that in all the navigating interest of the Mississippi river there was one universal protest raised against the construction of draw-bridges. They had had some experience of those things. They knew what the dangers and the interruptions were, and they said, "If you will bridge this river, at least throw around it the precaution that shall give us a bridge which will not interfere with the navigation; make it a bridge similar to the bridge that has been built across the St. Lawrence, a bridge similar to other bridges that are now in existence, and that simply require a little more money to make them permanent structures, and then we will forego our objections; we will take down our chimneys; we will change the construction of our steamers; we will dispense to a great extent with the height of our pilot-houses, and will adapt our system of navigation as far as practicable to facilitating the transit across the river." It was in pursuance of such suggestions that I felt called upon, in maturing the bill, to strike out the provision for draw-bridges. I will say further that so much had it impressed members of the Senate, and especially those resident upon the other branches of that stream, that they felt called upon to confer together and procure the passage of a bill for the appointment of a commission which should go to work and examine the topography of that stream, which should report upon the practicability of putting bridges across at these points, and which should lay before us at the next session of Congress that exact information upon which we could act with the assurance that we were not destroying or in any degree obstructing one of the great highways of this continent.

Now, sir, in view of the fact that that commission has been provided by law; in view of the fact that the Senator from Iowa, in his remarks in laboring through the attempt to give us some topographical knowledge of that country, failed to satisfy any one in regard to the exact features of the ground on either side where these bridges are proposed; in view of the dearth of all knowledge on our part in regard to what effect these draw-bridges are going to have—I say that the request of my colleague that the construction of these bridges be deferred until we can receive this report is not unreasonable. I do not think that my colleague has any desire to prevent the construction of bridges across that stream; I do not think that he has any hostility to the railroad interests of the country, but I do think that he has a very deep interest, matured by long study, of the navigation interests of the Mississippi river. I therefore ask that the Senate, in passing upon this measure, will put that guard around it so that we may have the benefit of this knowledge before these bridges are constructed. It will only be a delay of two or three months. It will be a delay that need not stop them at all, for they can go ahead, under the provisions of the amendment, and build the other kind of bridges. I do not see, really, what there is to be lost by it. I do not see why those gentlemen themselves who advocate these bridges should object to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Having had some professional connection with this subject, I beg leave to say a word or two upon the proposition immediately before us. I voted for the amendment suggested by the member from Missouri sitting next to me, [Mr. HENDERSON,] and for the same reason that I gave that vote, I shall vote for the amendment which he now suggests.

In the Wheeling bridge case, the bridge was erected by the authority of Virginia alone. It was a suspension bridge, and it was above the level of the water some fifty or sixty feet; but the court found, in fact, that some six or seven boats were impeded by the bridge as it then stood. I was counsel for the bridge, and insisted upon the right to trade across the river as well as the right to trade down the river. The two, therefore, if it was possible, should be made so to agree with each other that neither should injure the other. The court in the opinion, which Senators perhaps are not as familiar with as I am, and for that reason I refer to it, recognized the right of the bridge, provided a draw, which would not materially affect the navigation of the river, was furnished, and they, therefore, in their decree in that case said that the bridge was to be abated, unless they should elevate it some ninety feet for a space of some three hundred feet, or unless they were able by removing the bridge entirely from the western side of the river to furnish a channel on that side which would enable the vessels going up and down the river, when they could not go under the bridge, to avail themselves of that channel. Congress, however, afterward passed an act by which they declared that the bridge itself as it stood was a legal structure; and a majority of the Supreme Court held that that was within the power of Congress, and the bridge has, of course, ever since stood. They put it in so many words upon the ground that Congress, under the power to regulate commerce, has a right to prescribe the manner in which bridges across the navigable streams of the United States are to be built; what draws they are to have, or whether they are to be erected without draws; and they have a right to prescribe what height of chimney steamers should use.

The effect of that decision and of a subsequent decision in the Albany bridge case, which was a bridge proposed to be run across, and is now actually constructed across, the Hudson, at Albany, is this: that under the authority to regulate commerce Congress has no power to construct a bridge itself unless it owns the land on either side; that the authority to construct is vested in the States alone where the States have jurisdiction on both sides of the river over which the bridge is to be thrown; but that Congress have the authority, under the commercial power, to prescribe what draws are necessary in order to avoid any impediment to navigation, or whether bridges are to be built without draws and with an elevation which will remove all danger of impediment to the river.

Now, my friend from Missouri will not get clear of one difficulty in which he and those who are interested in the navigation of the river may be in consequence of the building of these bridges. The territory on each side of the river now belongs to some one of the States; the States not only have the authority but they have the exclusive authority to bridge; but that authority is to be exercised in subordination to what Congress may do under its exclusive authority to regulate commerce. If these bridges are built, and they may be built at once, one of two things will happen: either a multitude of lawsuits will be instituted in order to ascertain the fact whether the bridges create an improper impediment to the river, or Congress will be called upon to legislate hereafter. It seems to me, therefore, to be much better that we should in advance, by law, under our power to regulate commerce, provide what is to be the character of the bridge to be thrown over these streams, and that can only be safely done, I think, upon the judgment of a board of engineers.

Mr. BROWN. When I was up before, I was cut off in the remarks I was making by a fit of coughing. There is one other thing I desire to call the attention of the Senate to, and that is, that the objection which obtains to bridges there in the West is one that affects as much the width between the piers as it does the height of the structure. Now, the draw-bridges, as we all know, can only be made one half of the passage way for vessels that a bridge of a continuous span has; and that is becoming of daily greater importance to us from the fact that the whole course of trade is changing on the Mississippi river, and taking the shape of a tug with six or eight barges following after, instead of the ordinary single steamer which formerly plied. That requires greater passage way than even before, and therefore the reason is still greater and still more urgent that we should know exactly what we are doing in regard to these questions of topography before we pass this general bill. I trust that the Senate will concur in the amendment of my colleague, and I should like to have the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the question stated.

Mr. BROWN. It is simply to suspend the construction until we can have a report from our own commissioners on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be again read.

The Secretary read it. It was to insert at the end of the seventh section of the amendment of the House of Representatives the following:

And it is hereby further provided that no draw-bridge shall be constructed or commenced under the provisions of this act before the 1st day of March, 1887.

Mr. CONNESS. If this amendment had been offered while the bill was originally under consideration, or if it was under consideration here at another stage, I think I would vote with the Senator from Missouri for it; but this bill was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to consider the amendments that had been made by the House; and I do not think that this is the time to add such an amendment as the honorable Senator proposes.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Davis, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Sprague, Van Winkle, and Willey—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Fessenden, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Kirkwood, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Riddle, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Wright—13.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the pardon of the Senate for proposing one other amendment. I said that I would not do so. The Senator from Iowa objected that the bottom lands of the river could not be crossed without trestle-work, and that where that will be very high it will endanger the railroad interest. I now propose to enable them to build iron submerged tubular bridges so as to enable them to go entirely beneath the river. I understand from competent engineers that such bridges can be constructed without any impediment to navigation; and I have the indorsement of them in my hands, of Mr. Linville, also of Mr. Thomas A. Scott, the vice president of the Pennsylvania Central; J. Edgar Thompson, who is known to most Senators; the certificate of Mr. Miller and of Mr. Herman J. Lombaert, and also of Mr. W. W. Wright, who it will be remembered was the engineer in charge of the bridge-building under General Sherman. They all say that a submerged iron tubular bridge can be constructed so as not in the least to impede the navigation of this stream, and so constructed as to enable the railroads to carry on their business without any serious obstruction. If this can be done, why not let this commission certify the fact to us? If we can get rid of this trestle-work, which the Senator from Iowa thinks to be so very dangerous, and can go entirely beneath the surface of the water, let us do it.

Sir, I am serious and in earnest about this thing. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate, and I am not making frivolous motions. I am making motions which I believe would subserve the very best interests of the country, provided this Senate would adopt them. I am satisfied that the future will demonstrate it. I know that these bridges will not stand there. I know that they are going to prove an obstruction of the river. When I say that, I simply mean to say that Congress will repeal the law and will leave these gentlemen without any substantial foundation, and they will be beaten in the courts of the country; I mean to say that it will turn out that these bridges are an obstruction to the navigation of the river, and I mean to say that Congress, in the just exercise of a proper discretion in regard to the very best commercial and navigation interests of this country, will not permit them to stand.

Senators may say they know as much as I do upon this subject. Perhaps they do. I feel satisfied that no such bridge could be built upon any other great river in this country except the Mississippi river to-day by this Congress. I am satisfied that no other river navigable as this is could be so bridged. No proposition to bridge any of the waters from Lake Superior to Niagara falls would receive the consent or support of this Senate to-day; and yet there is no river between those lakes possessing the importance that this does; it is not a river having on it the commerce that this has. The Senator from Iowa is vastly mistaken when he supposes the railroad interests of this country are superior, so far as the business done is concerned.

Mr. GRIMES. I did not say so.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understood you to say so.

Mr. GRIMES. It was the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. YATES.]

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator tells me it was the Senator from Illinois. Then I will say that he is very much mistaken. I am aware that the merchants of St. Louis sent on a commission here a short time ago to protest against this measure. The committee came and delivered their papers in writing, and went home. It is not so with regard to the outside lobby interest. The Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad has had its president here during the whole winter urging forward the passage of a bill of this sort. A very distinguished citizen of Illinois, a resident of Quincy, has been here urging, with his vast political influence, the passage of a bill of this character. When I say that outside influences have urged on this thing, I am not mistaken; I cannot be mistaken. I did not mean to say that the farming interests of the country were unrepresented here, because Senators represent the interest of farmers as well as I do; but I undertake to say that those individuals who have been unjustly urging forward the passage of this bill, the outside men, are interested in attempting to show that no other bridge but a draw-bridge can be built with safety across this river. Distinguished engineers say that it can be done. Why is it that the railroad interests will not submit to the building of a submerged tabular bridge? It is, in my honest opinion, to clog the navigation of the river. They have that object; they have that before them. Why not let both interests prosper? I am not inimical to the railroad interest. I would bridge the Mississippi river every hundred yards, if desired, provided I could do it without obstructing the navigation of the stream. Why not subserve both interests?

The Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Illinois say that no such bridge can be built as one of these elevated bridges. Sir, they have the certificates of the most distinguished engineers against them, and they have the fact against them as demonstrated by the bridge at Steubenville, a successful structure, one that is not doubted to be a success. And yet upon the mere ipse dixit of these gentlemen, knowing no more about civil engineering than I do, we are to pass this bill and to insist that this character of bridges shall be built, whether all the engineers of this country shall report against it or not, whether the dearest interests of the country may condemn it or not. Sir, both interests can be subserved. I would not take one penny from any railroad company. I desire to see freights carried over them as cheaply as they can be carried. I desire that travel over them shall be as cheap as possible. I would interfere with neither of these interests. I would not permit the Mississippi river to stand in the way of bridge building by any means; but if a bridge can be built so as to save the navigation interests and also prosper the railroad interest, why not build such a bridge? I honestly believe it can be done; and that is all I have asked the Senate to do.

I have said nothing heretofore about submerged iron bridges, but we have a report before us showing that it can be done; and now I propose that if that character of bridge can be built under the report of the commission which we have provided on this subject, we shall wait until that report comes in. I move to amend the amendments of the House of Representatives by inserting at the end of the seventh section the following:

Provided, That no bridge usually known as a draw-bridge shall be constructed or commenced under the provisions of this act, unless it be found, and so reported by a board of engineers, to be appointed under the laws of the United States adopted at the present session of Congress, that such bridges can be constructed and operated at less cost than elevated bridges of continuous spans, or submerged iron tubular bridges, and without material obstruction to the navigation of the river.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The seventh section of the House amendment ought to be transposed so as to make it the last section. It provides that "the right to alter or amend this act so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said river by the construction of bridges, is hereby expressly reserved."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be done, unless there be objection. The Chair hears no objection. The question now is on concurring in the amendments of the House of Representatives, as amended.

Mr. BROWN. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that question. I desire to record my vote upon it.

Mr. GRIMES. The question is on concurring in the Senator's own amendment.

Mr. BROWN. No; that is not the question.

Mr. RAMSEY. That is all there is of it. Mr. BROWN. I do not desire to do that. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call for the yeas and nays is withdrawn.

The amendments of the House, as amended, were concurred in.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up House bill No. 602, to equalize the bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the late war for the Union. When the bill shall be taken up, so as to be the unfinished business for to-morrow, I will yield the floor to the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. POMEROY.]

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

DEATH OF HON. JAMES H. LANE.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President, I feel it my duty to arrest the business of the Senate for a brief period, while I announce the death of my late colleague, Hon. JAMES H. LANE, of Kansas, who departed this life on the 11th instant.

Death has been of frequent occurrence during the period of which I have been a member of this body. I believe no session has passed in which we have not been called to mourn the loss of some one of our number. And this session has been peculiarly marked in that respect. For we commenced it in mourning for the death of one of the distinguished Senators from Vermont, and the voice of that touching and most appropriate eulogy had scarcely died away in the murmur of our grief before we were called to bury his colleague who had mourned with us so sincerely.

Mr. President, the duty devolving upon me at this moment is both melancholy and painful. It is peculiarly so, because we contemplate the death of one who struck the life fountain with his own hand! In the midst of opportunities of usefulness; surrounded by a most interesting family; reëlected to a position congenial to his tastes and gratifying to his hopes, in a moment "of temporary aberration of mind," he "loosed the silver cord, and the golden bowl was broken."

I shall refer but briefly to incidents in the life and character of my late colleague, and confine myself chiefly to those which have fallen under my own observation. The history of his life in his native State, and during the Mexican war, I shall leave to the Senators from Indiana, who are more familiar with the record. My first acquaintance with the deceased Senator was in the spring of 1855. He had just removed to Kansas, and taken up his residence with the New England colony which had settled the town of Lawrence the year before. He had voted for the Kansas-Nebraska bill as member of the House of Representatives from Indiana in the Congress of 1854. He considered that act transferred the struggle which had agitated Congress and the country from the halls of legislation to the Territories of the United States. And as Kansas was foremost to enter the field of contest, General LANE came out, as he said, "to see fair play" upon the principles of the organic act, and did not, at first, identify himself with any party. An attempt was made to organize the Democratic party, but without success. There was, indeed, little contest, until the convention at Big Springs in September, 1855. The political struggle of parties which were not only to decide the fate of this young Territory but of all the rest, whether for freedom or for slavery, then commenced. General LANE was chairman of the committee on resolutions at that convention, and reported a platform which became the basis of the Free-State party. He then, and ever after, was fully identified with the Free-State cause, and was determined to share its fortunes in all its vicissitudes. And as difficulties increased and the contest deepened, he grew in strength and earnestness until he was deemed equal to the emergency.

No man knows until he is tried what he is capable of doing or of suffering; and certainly General LANE surpassed the expectations of his friends by his energy and foresight during the trying events which marked that period. He grappled successfully with every obstacle and became master of every situation. When clouds darkened his pathway, and for the moment he seemed prostrated, he would rise with renewed strength and vigor. Adversity could not conquer him; he only yielded to the insidious delusions of prosperity. He was a man of wonderful adaptabilities, and seized every occasion to turn events to a good account. While, technically, he was neither a scholar nor an orator, yet he was learned and eloquent; for he had closely studied men and knew every avenue to the human heart, and could arouse its deepest emotions. With his impassioned eloquence before the people he swayed multitudes who would hang upon his lips with breathless emotion, while they regarded his voice as little less than the breath of omnipotence.

I could not be true to history or to my own convictions if I did not here, and now, say that from the beginning to the end of our struggle in Kansas General LANE was true to the cause of freedom, and true to the pioneers who struggled with him to save our Territory from the crime and treason of human slavery. I forgive many faults in one who has such virtues.

Lawrence became the bulwark of freedom in Kansas, and LANE was the chosen leader. He was elected to the first Free-State convention to form a constitution at Topeka, and was chosen the presiding officer of that body. Under that constitution he was first elected, with Governor Reeder, to the Senate of the United States. While General LANE was at Washington urging our admission into the Union under that constitution, as a settlement of our difficulties, a conflict at home between opposing forces seemed inevitable. By the greatest prudence and foresight alone was a collision between the United States military forces avoided, while as a result, Lawrence was sacked and burned.

General LANE then left Washington, and with wonderful activity and energy went through the northern and western States raising men and arms for the settlers in Kansas. By the 1st of August, 1856, he had collected his little army and marched the first party of armed settlers through the State of Iowa into Nebraska and Kansas. The invaders fled from our soil before the presence of organized and armed emigration. At this opportune period Governor Geary became the executive officer of Kansas; a man who faces the music and never turned his back upon the foes of his country; who then, as now, was a noble leader in a noble cause, soon, I hope, to be honored by Pennsylvania as he has always honored her. Under his administration Kansas had a brief respite from the angry strife, and men of both political parties united in joint efforts to promote the prosperity of the Territory. But the interval was comparatively brief, and the resignation of Governor Geary was soon followed by the Leecompton convention, the history and character of which are familiar to all.

Senator LANE entered warmly into the canvass of 1860, and found in Mr. Lincoln a personal friend. In April, 1861, he was elected a member of the Senate of the United States, and took his seat here at the called session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, meeting for the first time July 4, 1861. That was at the beginning of the late rebellion, a foreshadowing of which he had seen in Kansas. During that short session he urged and voted for the most vigorous prosecution of the war, and in some measure comprehended its results. He closed one of his speeches on the 18th of July by this most distinctive announcement, "that slavery should perish rather than that one inch of this Union should be parted with."

I believe he was among the first, if not the very first, to enlist colored soldiers in the Union Army, for on the 4th day of August, 1862, he commenced the organization of the first colored regiment of Kansas; and although they were not received and mustered into the military service until 13th January, 1863, still in the mean time, when some were discouraged, he would not consent to the disbandment of the regiment, but authorized Colonel Williams, then in command of this regiment, to draw upon him for their support until the Government accepted them—thus pledging his private property for the support of this regiment. Finally they were accepted and mustered, which precedent was followed by the enlisting and mustering of the Massachusetts fifty-fourth, and then to swelling the ranks of the Union Army to the number of over two hundred and fifty thousand colored troops, thus, and for the first time, allowed to strike the redeeming blow of their own freedom!

Senator LANE rejoiced in every triumph of our brave Army, whether on the sea or on the land, and seemed to feel a profound personal mortification and defeat at every national reverse. My late colleague was a member of the Baltimore convention in 1864, and, with the late Senator King, of New York, took a prominent part in the deliberations of that body, and did much toward securing the result arrived at. Now, alas! both by similar rash acts have closed their eyes to the light of day, and are dead to the issues they helped to inaugurate.

Just previous to the late presidential election I witnessed the devotion of Senator LANE to the cause of our country, and his complete identification with the soldiers of Kansas, who were suddenly called to march to the border of the State to repel the invasion of the rebel General Sterling Price, who was then marching through Missouri with conquests and victory. In that contest, to save our State from fire and pillage, General LANE counted nothing too dear to offer for her defense. But with musket in hand he shared the labors, exposure, and conflict with the private soldier; thus endearing him to our people, he was a second time elected to the Senate. And the present Congress was the commencement of his second term.

But I shall not dwell upon the recent events of this session. They are too familiar to all. It seems but yesterday since he was going in and out among us. Nor shall I allude to the course that he took during this session, so painful to his friends. I prefer to turn my face to the brighter side of this extraordinary picture of human life, and let the shady side pass from view. I would step backward and throw the mantle of charity over all that I cannot approve. For the grave is silent. Death stereotypes all human actions and efforts, and allows no second edition to issue. The work of life is sealed and the record goes up on high, as well, also, as down to posterity through coming years. What is mysterious now may be revealed hereafter. At present we hardly know what to commend or what to condemn until the day of final disclosure.

My late colleague leaves an interesting family in the deepest sorrow, to say nothing of friends, to mourn his loss. But I trust that He who is the God of the fatherless and protects the widow will shield and protect them, and in coming years, when the shadows of life are lengthened, they may find paths of usefulness and honor, remembering that—

"That life is long
Which answers life's great ends."

Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate have learned with regret and sorrow of the sudden death of Hon. JAMES H. LANE, late a Senator from the State of Kansas.

Resolved, That as an evidence of respect to the memory of the deceased, and of sincere sorrow and sympathy for his bereaved and afflicted family, the Senate do now adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, Amos Lane, the father of JAMES H. LANE, was a distinguished citizen of the State of Indiana. His professional learning and force as a public speaker placed him among the able lawyers of the State. He was prominently connected with the early legislation of the State, and contributed to the establishment of our system of laws. For four years he was a Representative in Congress, and took rank as an able debater in that body.

JAMES H. LANE was born in the county of Dearborn, in the State of Indiana, on the 22d day of June, 1814, and that continued to be his home until 1853, when he identified his fortunes with the people of Kansas. He was educated for the bar, but did not long devote himself to the labors or pursue the honors of the profession. When the country became involved in the war with Mexico, he was among the first to respond to the call for troops. His rare energy of character was displayed in the restless zeal with which he prosecuted the work of raising and organizing the third regiment of Indiana volunteers. By the choice of the companies he was made the colonel and placed in command of the regiment.

That regiment was made up of the young men of southeastern Indiana, and was composed largely of the sons of the farmers; and in it were many of my youthful associates and friends, many whose friendship and esteem I yet cherish; and I think I am justified in saying that in every soldierly quality it was entitled to rank with the first and the proudest. Its fortunes became to me a subject of great interest, and from the day of the enrollment to the day of discharge I listened for every report of its gallant achievements, and was very proud of the great name with which it came out of the service. The art and science of war had been neglected in the State of Indiana, and the officers and men looked to the colonel for the care necessary to their comfort and safety and the discipline which made them formidable to the enemy. Under his command the regiment soon attained a high rank for its skill and discipline.

I need not speak of the battle of Buena Vista; of the great disparity in the numbers engaged; of the importance of its results, not only in holding the line of the Rio Grande, but perhaps in saving the army; of its decisive influence upon the fortunes of the war, and of the glory it shed upon our arms, for these are all known; but I cannot omit saying that, upon that rough field, the third Indiana occupied positions of greatest difficulty and responsibility, that it was borne upon by heavy forces of infantry, and dashed against by long lines of cavalry, and that in all the changing fortunes of the day it was neither broken or bent. Colonel LANE and the regiment were honorably mentioned in the report of the commanding general.

After the discharge of the third, Colonel LANE organized and commanded the fifth Indiana regiment, which was composed largely of his discharged veterans. That regiment rendered valuable service, and was discharged with a character highly honorable and gratifying to its commander. Colonel LANE was kind toward his men, careful of their wants, generous toward his subordinate officers, yet strict in his discipline, and enjoyed both the affection and confidence of his command. In the enemy's country he was vigilant and active, and upon the field of battle cool, sagacious, and brave.

Upon his return home, Colonel LANE was chosen, by a large vote, Lieutenant Governor of the State, and in 1852 was elected to Congress from the same district which his father had represented nearly twenty years before. He did not participate largely in the debates, and his service in the House was not specially marked. He supported the Administration of President Pierce, and upon its passage voted for the Kansas-Nebraska bill. I will not add to what the Senator, lately his colleague, has said of his eventful life after he left the State of Indiana. The estimate that may be put upon much of his conduct while he was connected with the border strife must depend upon the stand-point from which it is viewed. His character was not obscure, nor his conduct concealed. His virtues and his faults were alike conspicuous, and will now remain as models for imitation or beacons of dangers to be avoided.

His ambition and passions were imperious, and his will dominant, so that, defiant of opposition and popular opinion, he pursued his objects with an energy and force that wrung success from adverse circumstances and reluctant fortune. He was not endowed with high powers of argument, nor with a cultivated imagination or elevated sentiment, nor did he possess in a high degree the command of our language, yet the force and impulse of his nature, sometimes carrying him to the verge of frenzy, made him a public speaker of great power and a formidable revolutionary leader. Implacable toward his foes, he was generous toward his friends and untiring in his efforts to serve them.

I think it proper on this occasion to say that on the evening before leaving this city for his home he sent for me to examine some documents which he had obtained for his defense against a recent charge that he had received money for his services in connection with some Indian business. Upon examination of the papers, and as I understood the case, I thought his vindication complete. I have understood that upon a like examination my colleague arrived at the same opinion.

It was a sad communication to each one of us when we were told that one of our number was in the hands of death. In whatever form that messenger from another world may come, he strikes us with awe and terror; but his presence is never so appalling as when he lays his destroying hand upon the human intellect, enthrones distraction, sets the faculties at war, and proclaims—

"Mischief, thou art afoot, Take thou what course thou wilt!"

An active, perturbed spirit has gone from our midst, and from this saddest permission of Providence we are admonished of the frailty of the human intellect, of its inability to preserve itself, and of its strange and most unnatural action when broken loose from the lines prescribed for its government.

Mr. President, I second the resolutions.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, Senator LANE was a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, and for several years our intercourse was constant. I had come to know him well. While he had great faults, he had many great and good qualities of character. He was certainly a man of no ordinary intellect, not of the highest order perhaps, and was gifted with as fine a temperament for activity and endurance as I have ever known. He was undoubtedly a man of courage; a man, if not gifted with a high order of eloquence, yet possessed of great power, especially in his addresses to popular assemblies. He certainly possessed great power among the people of his own State, and was ever faithful and most devoted to what he deemed to be the interest of Kansas. I say he was a man of great power in addressing a popular assembly. I have seen and heard many address assemblies, but I think never in my life have I seen a popular assembly moved as they were moved by an address of JAMES H. LANE, in 1856, in the State of Wisconsin.

He was a man strong in his friendships and not less implacable in his hatreds. He was a soldier in the Mexican war and attained distinction in it. He was from the first engaged in the great troubles in Kansas. Passing through scenes of violence, it is not to be wondered at that a man of his temperament and character should become a man of violence himself. As is known to some of his friends, some acts which transpired there, and especially one in relation to the taking of the life of a fellow-being at Lawrence, put upon his soul a burden which was never lifted, although he could justify to himself the act which had been done. As I have said, sir, there were many great and good qualities in his character. He was a true and devoted and constant friend. I cannot call to mind the circumstances under which his death has occurred without being weighed with sadness. I have no doubt that his mind was in a state of aberration; that he was insane. Indeed he had given evidence of it to some extent before he left the city of Washington; and I have been informed, upon the authority of his physician who attended him at St. Louis, that he gave evidence of it there also.

Mr. President, allusion has been made by one who preceded me to another friend as dear to me as any who has ever sat in this Chamber, whose life was taken by his own hands. I refer to the late Preston King. These two events, happening within so brief a period to two who have been so well known and so distinguished in this body, are to me a source of deep grief.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 18, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

Mr. ORTH. I move that the reading of the Journal of yesterday be dispensed with. The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. On account of the state of my health I am constrained to ask leave of absence for the remainder of the session.

No objection being made, the leave of absence was granted.

GRADE OF GENERAL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the indulgence of the House to take from the Speaker's table House bill No. 3, to revive the grade of General, returned from the Senate with an amendment.

No objection being made, the bill was taken up, and the amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

That the pay proper of the General shall be $400 per month, and his allowance for fuel and quarters, when his headquarters are in Washington, shall be at the rate of $300 per month, and his other allowances in all respects the same as are allowed to the Lieutenant General by the second section of the act approved February 29, 1864, entitled "An act reviving the grade of Lieutenant General in the United States Army," and the chief of staff to the Lieutenant General shall be transferred and be the chief of staff to the General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general in the Army of the United States; and the act approved March 3, 1865, entitled "An act to provide for a chief of staff to the Lieutenant General commanding the armies of the United States," is hereby repealed; and the said General may select from the line of the Army for service upon his staff such number of aids, not exceeding six, as he may judge proper, who during the term of such service shall each have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry. And it is hereby provided, that in lieu of the staff now allowed by law to the Lieutenant General, he shall be entitled to two aids and one military secretary, each to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel of cavalry during the term of such staff service.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to strike out the words "the line of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the regular Army;" so that it will read, "select from the regular Army." That was the meaning intended by the mover of the amendment.

The amendment to the Senate's amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment as amended was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

MEMPHIS RIOT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask leave to file with the Clerk the report of the committee on the Memphis riot, and that the minority be permitted to present a report.

Leave was granted.

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The House was kind enough to grant leave to the Committee on Commerce when I was unwell to report two or three bills. I now ask the House to grant that indulgence to the acting chairman of the committee instead of myself.

No objection was made.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. ELIOT offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to present to the Secretary of State the act entitled "An act to continue in force and to amend an act for the relief of freedmen and refugees, and for other purposes," together with the certificates of the Clerk of the House of Representatives and Secretary of the Senate, showing that the said act was passed by a vote of two thirds of both Houses of Congress after the objections of the President thereto had been received, and after the reconsideration of said act by both Houses in accordance with the Constitution.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST.

Mr. McCLURG. I presume that the House will be gratified when I say that five minutes need not be consumed in the consideration of the election case of Koontz vs. Coffroth. It was the intention of Mr. Coffroth to have addressed the House on the occasion, but yesterday he informed me that he had been indisposed for some days and had therefore made no preparation, and he was compelled to leave the city. He did leave last evening, and he authorized me to state that he was willing to have the vote taken in the case at any time provided leave was granted to him to print a speech of one hour in length. I ask, therefore, that that leave be given; and also that leave be given to the contestant, Mr. Koontz, to print a speech one half hour in length. And as I have no disposition to unnecessarily detain the House, I ask that my remarks, not exceeding thirty minutes in length, may be printed. If that be granted I will move the previous question.

No objection was made.

[The remarks of the gentlemen will be published in the Appendix.]

The Clerk read the resolutions reported by the committee, as follows:

Resolved, That Alexander H. Coffroth is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the sixteenth district of Pennsylvania in the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Resolved, That William H. Koontz is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the sixteenth district of Pennsylvania in the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. McCLURG moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KOONTZ thereupon appeared, was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, and took his seat.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. STEVENS. What is the regular order? The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object to everything else.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment to withdraw some papers. Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I will yield for that purpose.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the petition and articles of association of the Evangelical Lutheran St. John's congregation of Washington, District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. McKEE, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Chenault & Co.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. McKEE. I ask leave of absence for the remainder of the session.

No objection was made, and the leave of absence was granted.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports, commencing with the Committee for the District of Columbia.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WELKER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the Senate No. 246, relating to the public schools in the District of Columbia; upon which he demanded the previous question.

So the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAIL IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WELKER also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, bill of the House No. 124, authorizing the construction of a jail, penitentiary, and house of correction in and for the District of Columbia.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. WELKER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a substitute, House bill No. 230, to amend an act to extend the charter of the Alexandria and Georgetown Railroad Company, passed March 3, 1863.

The substitute was read. The first section provides that the Washington, Alexandria, and Georgetown Railroad Company, a corporation lawfully succeeding to the charter, rights, and privileges of the Alexandria and Georgetown Railroad Company, shall be authorized to extend said railroad from the track as now laid, or as the same may hereafter be laid, through Maryland avenue, at the intersection of Sixth street west, through and along Sixth to a point at the intersection of Pennsylvania avenue, which may be suitable for a depot for passengers and freight.

The second section provides that the company shall be authorized to extend their railroad from the track as the same is now or may hereafter be laid through Maryland avenue at the intersection with Virginia avenue, through and along said Virginia avenue in an easterly direction, to the intersection of D street south, and thence along D street and along Washington canal to New Jersey avenue; thence by a curve of not less than a thousand feet radius to a point in square No. 732; thence by a tunnel to a point in square No. 893; thence by a curve into Eighth street east, and thence by the most direct and eligible route to the intersection of the Washington branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad.

The third section provides that the provisions of section three of the act to which this is an amendment shall be applicable to the extension of said road or track hereby authorized, and it shall be lawful for said company to construct a bridge and draw across the Washington canal, of such plans and dimensions as may be approved by the corporation of Washington, and so as not to interfere with the navigation of said canal, and also to use steam power for the transportation of passengers and freight over said branches, subject to such restrictions as may be imposed by the corporation of Washington, in respect to the portions within the city limits.

The fourth section provides that the railroad company shall be required to pay all damage resulting to private property, and in the event of the company and the owner or owners of such private property failing to agree upon the amount of damages and the value of the private property appropriated, such proceedings shall thereupon be had for the assessment of damages as are authorized and required by the laws now in force in the District of Columbia regulating the assessment of damages for opening streets, roads, and alleys in the District; and upon the payment or tender to the owners of the amount of damages so assessed, the company shall acquire the right to use and occupy all such lands so appropriated as may be necessary for the proper working and running of said road.

The fifth section provides that if at any time any other railroad company shall desire to use and occupy the tunnel authorized by this act, either on the same track or another alongside thereof, they shall have the right to do so, upon such fair and reasonable terms as may be agreed upon by said parties to such joint occupancy; and in case the parties cannot agree, the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall fix the terms.

The sixth section provides that this act shall go into effect from the time of its passage.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT METROPOLITAN POLICE.

Mr. WELKER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back without amendment, and with a recommendation that the same do pass, Senate bill No. 137, to amend the acts approved August 6, 1861, and July 16, 1862, establishing a Metropolitan police in the District of Columbia, to increase the efficiency thereof, and for other purposes.

The bill, which was read, provides, in the first section, that the chief executive officer of the police shall hereafter be styled major; the present sergeants shall be called lieutenants; and roundsmen called sergeants, and the patrolmen called privates; and that, in addition to the officers and employés the commissioners of the Metropolitan police, in the District of Columbia are now authorized by law to appoint, the commissioners be authorized to appoint one captain, who shall be the inspector of the force, command it in sickness or absence of the major, and perform such other duties as the commissioners may direct; one clerk in the office of the major, who shall have charge of the records of the sanitary company, and perform such duties as the major, by direction or with the approval of the commissioners, may prescribe; twenty sergeants and fifty patrolmen or privates.

The second section provides that the provisions of the sixth section of the act of July 16, 1862, authorizing the selection of justices of the peace by the board of police to officiate at the respective station-houses, be construed to provide for the hearing of all cases of offense against statutory, corporation, or common law, of which the board is charged by law with the execution; and all fines imposed by any justice within either of the jurisdictions of the Metropolitan police district shall be, by the justices imposing the same, paid into the hands of the treasurer of the board of police, on the first Thursday after the same shall have been collected, who shall duly receipt therefor, in duplicate, to the credit of the city or county within which the offense was committed; and such justice shall, in each case, return the original receipt to the treasurer of the same jurisdiction; and the treasurer of the police board shall pay over such sums monthly to the proper officers of said city or county, upon proper receipts, except as afterward provided.

It is provided in the third section that from and after the expiration of licenses already granted it shall be unlawful for any person or persons keeping an ordinary, restaurant, saloon, or other place where spirituous liquors are sold within the District of Columbia, to give, sell, or dispose of any intoxicating drinks without a license approved by the board of police; and hereafter no such license shall be considered legal by any of the authorities having jurisdiction within the District, until the same shall have been approved by the board of police and so certified by the secretary thereof under the office seal.

The third section proposes to enact that the board of police shall provide specific rules for uniform clothing of the police force, which shall be procured by each of the members thereof respectively, strictly in conformity with such rules, at his own expense and risk, and he shall be removed from such force for not complying with such rules.

The fourth section provides that from and after the passage of this act the property clerk of the Metropolitan police district shall be vested with all the powers now conferred by law upon notaries public and justices of the peace in the District of Columbia. He may administer oaths and certify depositions which may be necessary to establish the ownership of any property or money lost, abandoned, or returned to him under the directions of the board of police, other than such as may be so returned as the proceeds of crime; and upon satisfactory evidence of such ownership he shall deliver the same to said owner, his heirs and legal representatives, and to him or them only, except it be proven impracticable for such owner, heirs, or representatives to appear, when the same may be delivered and receipted for upon such proof of ownership and the filing in the office of said property clerk of a duly executed power of attorney from the owner or his heirs or legal representatives. And any property or money returned to the property clerk as the proceeds of crime, and which shall not be called for as evidence by any proceeding in the courts of the District within one year from the date of such return, may, unless specially claimed by the owner within that time, be thereafter treated as other unclaimed, abandoned, or lost property or money, as provided in the act of July 16, 1862.

The fifth section proposes to enact that where animals or articles of property, other than money, are returned to the property clerk as the proceeds of crime, when shown by sufficient evidence to be necessary for the current use of the owners and not for sale, (except perishable property that may be delivered to the owner on ample security being taken by the committing magistrate for his appearance at the criminal court to prosecute the case,) the board of police shall have power, in its discretion, to authorize the property clerk to place the same in the custody of such owners upon sufficient bonds being given by the owner or owners in the sum of twice the value thereof, conditioned for the production of the same at any time within one year, when required for use in court as evidence in any proceeding thereon, in accordance with the provisions required by the act of July 16, 1862. Large quantities of goods held for sale by the owners, that may come into the possession of the property clerk as the proceeds of crime, may be delivered to the owner, his heirs, or representatives, as provided in section eight of this act, upon ample security to prosecute, except those of an estimated value of fifty dollars, which shall be retained by the property clerk until the discharge or conviction of the accused, as required by the act.

It is provided in the sixth section that hereafter no person shall assume or practice the occupation of detective within the limits of the District of Columbia who shall not first receive a specific appointment for that purpose; or if pursuing the detection of criminals as a private business outside of such authority, and not otherwise specifically authorized by law, any person so practicing shall enter into bonds to the board of police with surety in the sum of not less than $10,000, to be approved by the board of police, for a faithful and correct return to the board, in such manner and at such times as the board of police shall direct, of all business transacted by such private detective; and in each and every case of a forfeiture of such bond or bonds for failure to make such returns to the board as required, or for failure of persons accused by such bonded private detectives to appear to answer charges in court, it shall be the duty of the attorney of the United States for the said District to immediately prosecute the sureties thereon to the full extent of a recovery of the forfeitures. And it is declared the duty of any person prosecuting the business of private detective who may arrest a person for crime to bring the person arrested with all evidence of the alleged crime, including property or money which may become evidence, immediately to the office of the superintendent of police, or the nearest Metropolitan police station, where the case shall undergo an examination before the magistrate assigned thereto, and all laws or parts of laws that govern the Metropolitan police in the matters of persons, property, or money, shall hereafter be applicable to detectives, (or to persons practicing as detectives, whatever other name they may assume,) who shall make like returns and dispositions thereof, as required by law and the rules of the board of police governing the Metropolitan police force.

The sixth section proposes to enact that upon the execution of a private detective's bond, it shall be the duty of such private detectives to report to the secretary of the board of police, who shall file such bond and record the name, age, description, nationality, and residence of such private detective; and it shall be unlawful for such detectives, or any member of the Metropolitan police force, or for any and all other persons, to compromise a felony or any other unlawful act, or to participate in, assent to, aid, or assist any person suspected of crime to escape a full judicial examination by failing to give known facts or reasonable causes of suspicion, or withholding any information relative to the charge or suspicion from the police magistrate or justice, or in any manner to receive any money, property, favor, or other compensation from, or on account of, any person arrested or subject to arrest for any crime or supposed crime, or to permit any such person to go at large without due effort to secure an investigation of such supposed crime. For any violation of the provisions of this section, the policeman or private detective, or other person guilty, is to be deemed as having compromised a felony, and to be thereafter prohibited from acting as an officer of the Metropolitan police force or as a private detective, and is to be prosecuted to the extent of the law for aiding criminals to escape the ends of justice.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 119) for the relief of Isaac Ranney, internal revenue collector for the eighth district of Ohio; and

An act (H. R. No. 518) for the relief of the owners of the bark Maria Henry.

CANAL AND SEWERAGE COMPANY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, Senate bill No. 190, to incorporate the District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company.

The bill was read.

The amendments reported by the committee were to change the names of some of the corporations and to insert at the end of section seventeen the words "except in the mode and manner as hereinbefore provided for."

Mr. INGERSOLL. I now demand the previous question on the amendments.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I hope the gentleman will not call the previous question without some explanation about the amendments.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I presume there will be very little explanation required. We have stricken out some of the names of the incorporators and inserted others.

Mr. F. THOMAS. How in regard to the last amendment?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The last amendment provides for the condemnation of private or public property in the manner provided by the preceding sections of the bill and in no other way.

Mr. F. THOMAS. Will the gentleman allow me to make an explanation about this amendment?

Mr. INGERSOLL. How long will it require?

Mr. F. THOMAS. I declare I cannot tell; about twenty minutes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. This bill has been very thoroughly discussed in the House on a previous occasion, and the gentleman himself has discussed it at great length.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I shall object to anything being said on the part of the gentleman from Illinois unless he will allow me to respond.

He calls the previous question and it stops debate.

Mr. ALLEY. Is it in order to move to lay the whole subject on the table?

The SPEAKER. Not now, while the gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a question of order. By what authority does the gentleman from Illinois use the name of the assessor of my district, Mr. Babcock, in this bill?

Mr. INGERSOLL. By the authority of the committee.

Mr. HALE. I trust the gentleman will correct the grammar of his last amendment before it goes into the bill by striking out the word "as." It reads "except in the mode and manner as herein provided for."

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is immaterial one way or the other.

On seconding the demand for the previous question no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. INGERSOLL and ALLEY.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 40.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I demand the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 51, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Baxter, Benjamin, Bingham, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, James R. NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Baker, Bidwell, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Davis, Dawson, DeFrees, Eckley, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Kasson, Kelley, Kerr, Latham, Loan, McCullough, McKee, Morris, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Seofield, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Taber, Taylor, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Warner, Whaley, James F. Wilson, and Wright—51.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Elaine, Blow, Brandegee, Buckland, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Daves, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Farquhar, Finck, Garfield, Goodyear, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, Kelso, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, Melndoe, Patterson, Phelps, Ponero, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Upson, Van Aernam, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and Winfield—62.

So the main question was ordered.

The question being upon the amendments reported by the Committee for the District of Columbia, it was put; and there were—ayes 46, noes 38; no quorum voting.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 47, not voting 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Barker, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Delano, Deming, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, John H. Hubbard, James R. NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Davis, Dawson, Eckley, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kasson, Kelley, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, McCullough, Morris, Niblack, Nicholson, Orth, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Taber, Taylor, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, James F. Wilson, and Wright—47.

NOT VOTING: Messrs. Arcona, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Bosman, Benjamin, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Buckland, Chandler, Conkling, Cook, Culloin, Culver, Darling, Dawes, DeLoes, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Briggs, Dumont, Faganhar, Finck, Goodear, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkies, Asa H. W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Ladlin, Luc, Lind, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McIndoe, McKee, Neell, Patterson, Phelps, Pomerooy, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Unson, Van Aernam, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, and Winfield—70.

So the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired and the bill goes over.

ASSAULT UPON A COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. ALLEY. I rise to a question of privilege. The select committee to whom was referred the investigation of the assault made yesterday upon U. H. Painter, have instructed me to report in part that no evidence sufficient to warrant the detention of Edward Towers appears, in the judgment of the committee, and they recommend that he be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I merely desire to say that I do not concur in this report, so that when the evidence is published it may not be supposed that I assented to any report of this kind. I think the evidence does sufficiently implicate Mr. Towers to justify us in holding him until a final report shall be made.

The SPEAKER. The committee recommend the discharge of Edward Towers arrested for participation in an assault on the clerk of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House. The question is upon discharging Mr. Towers.

The question was put, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So it was ordered that Edward Towers be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask leave of absence for the rest of the session for Mr. HENDERSON, of Oregon, and for Mr. DENNY, the Delegate from Washington Territory.

No objection was made, and the leave of absence was granted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks leave of absence after to-day for Mr. HALE.

No objection was made, and the leave of absence was granted.

Mr. DAVIS. My colleague, Mr. MARVIN, is absent on account of sickness. I ask leave of absence for him.

No objection was made, and the leave of absence was granted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table for the purpose of disposing of the House bills returned with Senate amendments.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Iowa is in order. It would take a gentleman off the floor after the expiration of the morning hour, even when he was making a speech. The rule will be found on page 84 of the Digest.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa; and it was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON RETRENCHMENT.

The House accordingly proceeded to the business upon the Speaker's table; the first business being the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House providing for a joint committee on retrenchment.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In lines eight and nine strike out the word "civil" before the word "service."

In lines sixteen strike out "two" and insert "three."

In line seventeen strike out "three" and insert "five."

In line twenty-one strike out "civil."

In line twenty-five, after the word "reduced," insert the following: "what are the methods of procuring accountability in public officers or agents in the care and disbursement of public moneys, whether moneys have been paid out illegally, and whether any officers, or agents, or other persons, have been or are employed in the service without authority of law or unnecessarily."

In line twenty-seven, strike out the word "civil." In line twenty-eight, after the word "curtailed," insert the following: "and also to consider the expediency of so amending the laws under which appointments to the public service are now made as to provide for the selection of subordinate officers after due examination by proper boards, their continuance in office during specified terms, unless dismissed upon charges preferred and sustained before tribunals designated for that purpose, and for withdrawing the public service from being used as an instrument of political or party patronage."

The concurrent resolution, as amended, read as follows:

Whereas the financial condition of the United States demands the exercise of a rigid economy in all departments of the Government in order to sustain the credit of the United States, and to relieve the people at the earliest possible day from the burden of existing taxation; and whereas there is reason to believe that in many departments of the service abuses have for a long time existed, and still exist, in the perpetration of useless offices and sinecures, in extravagant salaries and allowances, and in other unnecessary and wasteful expenditures:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That a joint select committee be appointed, to consist of three members of the Senate and five members of the House, to be styled the joint select committee on retrenchment; that said committee be instructed to inquire into the expenditures in all the branches of the service of the United States, and report whether any and what offices ought to be abolished, whether any and what salaries or allowances ought to be reduced; what are the methods of procuring accountability in public officers or agents in the care and disbursement of public moneys; whether moneys have been paid out illegally; and whether any officers or agents or other persons have been or are employed in the service without authority of law or unnecessarily; and generally how and to what extent the expenses of the service of the country may and ought to be curtailed; and also to consider the expediency of so amending the laws under which appointments to the public service are now made as to provide for the selection of subordinate officers after due examination by proper boards, their continuance in office during specified terms, unless dismissed upon charges preferred and sustained before tribunals designated for that purpose, and for withdrawing the public service from being used as an instrument of political or party patronage; that said committee be authorized to sit during the recess of Congress, to send for persons and papers, and to report by bill or otherwise; and that said committee may appoint a clerk for the term of six months, and no more.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to amend the last amendment of the Senate by adding thereto the following:

And to inquire into all accounts and statements in reference to the Government debt and the management thereof; and the mode of depositing and keeping the public money, and all accounts relating thereto.

Mr. HALE. I now call the previous question on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] and the amendments of the Senate.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, was agreed to.

The amendments of the Senate, as amended, were concurred in.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BENICIA AND SANTA CRUZ LAND TITLES.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 557, to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of Benicia.

The amendments of the Senate were as follows:

Add to the bill the following section:
And be it further enacted, That all the right and title of the United States to the lands within the corporate limits of the town of Santa Cruz, in the State of California, as defined in the act of the Legislature of that State incorporating said town, be, and the same are hereby, relinquished and granted to the corporate authorities of said town and their successors, in trust, for and with authority to convey so much of said lands as are in the bona fide occupancy of parties upon the passage of this act, by themselves or tenant, to such parties: Provided, That this grant shall not extend to any reservation of the United States nor prejudice any valid adverse right or claim, if such exist, to said land, or any part thereof, nor preclude any judicial examination and adjustment thereof; and.

Amend the title by adding thereto the words "and the town of Santa Cruz, in the State of California."

Mr. JULIAN. I would inquire now much land is surrendered by the amendment of the Senate to the town of Santa Cruz.

Mr. McRUER. The memorial of the trustees of the town states that it is sixteen hundred acres.

Mr. JULIAN. It is public land, is it?

Mr. McRUER. The point is this: this land has not been considered public land for the last hundred years. It was settled in 1770 as a mission, and about forty years since it was secularized by an act of the Government of Mexico. This is an old town, one of the oldest in the State, and this land has been held as public property for the last forty years. At the time the United States land commissioners sat in California to determine the question between private and public lands, the authorities of the town failed to present this claim to the commissioners, and therefore it never has been acted upon. Now they come to Congress and ask that the title of the United States to so much of the land as is within the corporate limits of the town, which was incorporated by an act of the last Legislature, may be relinquished. This provision is just the same as that we have already passed in relation to the city of Benicia, granting to the trustees of the town the Government title to the lands within the corporate limits, for the benefit of the actual possessors thereof.

Mr. JULIAN. I knew nothing about the facts, and I simply wished a public statement, so that the House may understand it.

Mr. McRUER. This matter has been before the Committee on Public Lands, and I am authorized to report a bill to this effect. I now call the previous question on the amendments of the Senate.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. McRUER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD IN KANSAS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 448) entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a railroad through certain land of the United States in Kansas."

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill the following:
That this privilege shall be allowed as long as the Secretary of War shall in his discretion determine, and no longer.

The amendment was concurred in.

CHARLES BREWER AND COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 555) entitled "An act for the relief of Charles Brewer & Co."

The amendments were read, as follows:

After the word "Boston" insert the words "agents for the bark Kamehameha V. in coin."
Amend the title, so as to read, "An act for the relief of the owners of the bark Kamehameha V."

The amendments were concurred in.

PENSIONS OF WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 692) entitled "An act increasing the pension of widows and orphans, and for other purposes."

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF ARMY OFFICERS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendments to joint resolution (H. R. No. 191) for the relief of certain officers of the Army.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line three strike out the words "and was entitled by law to be mustered in as such."

In lines six and seven strike out the words "according to the regulations."

Insert after the word "days," in line seven, the following words: "from acceptance of appointment or actual entry upon duty, and who, if not killed in battle, was afterward regularly mustered into the service of the United States."

After the word "emoluments," in line nine, insert the words "of his rank."

At the end of the resolution add a new section, as follows:

And be it further resolved, That the heirs or legal representatives of any officer whose muster into service has been or shall be amended hereby shall be entitled to receive the arrears of pay due such officer or the pension provided by law for the grade into which such officer is mustered under the provisions of the first section of this resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, and ask the appointment of a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendment to a bill (H. R. No. 334) entitled "An act to fix the number of judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to change certain judicial circuits."

The amendment of the Senate was read. It proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a new bill.

The substitute proposed by the Senate provides in the first section that no vacancy in the office of associate justice of the Supreme Court shall be filled by appointment until the number of associate justices shall be reduced to six; and thereafter the Supreme Court shall consist of a Chief Justice and six associate justices, any four of whom shall be a quorum. It is further provided that the court shall hold one term annually at the seat of Government, and such adjourned or special terms as it may find necessary for the dispatch of business.

The second section of the substitute provides that the first and second circuits shall remain as now constituted; that the districts of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware shall constitute the third district; that the districts of Maryland, West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina shall constitute the fourth circuit; that the districts of Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas shall constitute the fifth circuit; that the districts of Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky, and Tennessee shall constitute the sixth circuit; that the districts of Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin shall constitute the seventh circuit; that the districts of Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Arkansas shall constitute the eighth circuit; and the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada, shall constitute the ninth circuit.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand the previous question on concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to know whether the bill has ever been to the Judiciary Committee of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It originated with the House committee, and we are satisfied with the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. So far as the records of Congress show, the gentleman's statement is not borne out.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I call for the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I ask whether this is the House bill.

The SPEAKER. It is the House bill with an amendment by the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I hope the previous question will not be seconded, and that this question will be fully discussed in the House.

Mr. HALE. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa whether the Judiciary Committee have considered this amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This amendment has not been formally before the committee, but the members of the committee have consulted about it and a majority of them recommend concurrence.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Consulted where? It is not a report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa does not claim that it is a report of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Then it certainly ought to be reported from the committee.

Mr. SPALDING. Is this the bill which forms the new districts?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPALDING. And puts Michigan, Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee into one district?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Clerk will please read in regard to that.

The Clerk read the clause declaring that the States of Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky, and Tennessee shall constitute the sixth circuit.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope that will not be agreed to without allowing some discussion.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow me a word?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I simply wish to say that I am opposed to the bill at present. If the bill to reorganize the judiciary should pass the House, then I might possibly be in favor of this bill, but unless that does pass it seems to me it would be very unwise for us to adopt the provisions inserted by the Senate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask that the States composing the seventh circuit be read.

The Clerk read the clause declaring that the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin shall constitute the seventh circuit.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I ask the gentleman from Iowa if this bill abolishes the judge whose appointment the President sent to the Senate the other day.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This is a bill which passed the House before any nomination was made.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Does it abolish the new judgeship?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It abolishes the new judgeship, and provides for the reduction of the number of judges, as vacancies may occur, to six. I know that a number of the members of the Supreme Court think it will be a vast improvement.

Mr. WRIGHT. Where does the gentleman get his authority for the reduction of the number of judges?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand the previous question.

On seconding the demand for the previous question there were—ayes 53, noes 40.

Mr. SPALDING. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. SPALDING, and WILSON of Iowa. The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 29.

So the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I demand the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment of the Senate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 41, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Defrees, Deming, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Kelley, Koontz, Ladin, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McRuer, Meaurio, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Stevens, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Boutwell, Boyer, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jencks, Johnson, Kasson, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, McCullough, Miller, Moorhead, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Taber, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Whaley, Woodbridge, and Wright—41.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Baldwin, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Cook, Culom, Culver, Darling, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Farnsworth, Fink, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Harris, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, Julian, Kelso, Ketcham, Le Blond, Marshall, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Slater, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, and Winfield—63.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. ALLEY. I rise to a question of privilege. I find my name recorded in the Globe as not voting on the question of the expulsion of Hon. Mr. ROUSSEAU. I was present and voted in the affirmative, that is, in favor of his expulsion.

The SPEAKER. The Journal also has the same record. It will be corrected accordingly.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was House bill No. 50, to amend the fifth section of an act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, so as to extend the time within which the provisions of said act shall be accepted and such colleges established, returned from the Senate with amendments.

The amendments, which were of a verbal character, were agreed to.

REGISTERS OF VESSELS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was House bill No. 727, declaratory of an act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue registers to vessels in certain cases," approved February 10, 1866, returned from the Senate with amendments.

The amendments, which were of a verbal character, were agreed to.

TERRITORY OF MONTANA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was House bill No. 466, erecting the Territory of Montana into a surveying district, and for other purposes, returned from the Senate with amendments.

The amendments were reported.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to concur in the amendments of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to—ayes sixty-five, noes not counted.

ISAAC RANNEY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was House joint resolution No. 119, for the relief of Isaac Ramsey, internal revenue collector for the eighth district of Ohio, returned from the Senate with an amendment.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out "Ramsey," wherever it occurs, and insert "Ranney."

The amendment was agreed to.

BARK MARIA HENRY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was House bill No. 518, for the relief of the owners of the bark Maria Henry, returned from the Senate with an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move that the House concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. WHEELER.

The SPEAKER. The last business on the Speaker's table, of the kind covered by the order of the House, is the Senate amendment to the House bill No. 695, for the relief of William H. Wheeler, of Bangor, Maine.

The amendment of the Senate was to add to the bill the following:

With a good and sufficient bond, with security to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to indemnify the United States against all loss, cost, or damages incurred by reason of issuing said duplicate bonds.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in, and upon that motion I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to reconsider the various votes by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also move to lay that motion upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time, Senate bill No. 414, to regulate the time and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object.

PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S BUREAU.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I wish to announce to the House that on to-morrow, after the expiration of the morning hour, I will ask the House to proceed to the consideration of the question of privilege arising between Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING and Provost Marshal General Fry. The evidence in the case will be laid upon the desks of members to-morrow, and I would like to ask their attention to it so that we may consume as little of the time of the House by discussion as possible.

RICHARD W. MEADE, DECEASED.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration by the House at this time Senate joint resolution No. 39, to refer the claim of the administrator of Richard W. Meade, deceased, to the Court of Claims. It passed the Senate unanimously, and I presume it will pass the House without objection.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

PROTECTION OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. MORRILL. I call for the special order.

The House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 780, to protect the revenue, and for other purposes.

The first section provides that from and after the 1st day of August, 1866, in lieu of the duties now imposed by law on the articles mentioned and embraced in this section, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots of all kinds, $2 50 per pound, and, in addition thereto, fifty per cent. ad valorem; and no tare for the box in which any cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes are packed shall be allowed in ascertaining the weight; provided that paper cigars and cigarettes, including wrappers, shall be subject to the same duties as are imposed upon cigars; and provided further, that on and after the 1st day of August, 1866, no cigars shall be imported unless the same are packed in boxes of not more than five hundred cigars in each box; and no entry of any imported cigars shall be allowed of less quantity than three thousand in a single package; and all cigars on importation shall be placed in public store or bonded warehouse, and shall not be removed therefrom until the same shall have been inspected and a stamp affixed to each box indicating such inspection, with the date thereof; the Secretary of the Treasury being authorized to provide the requisite stamps, and to make all necessary regulations for carrying these provisions of law into effect. On cotton, three cents per pound.

On all compounds or preparations of which distilled spirits is a component part of chief value, there shall be levied a duty not less than that imposed upon distilled spirits.

The second section provides that the proviso in section four of an act entitled "An act amendatory of certain acts imposing duties upon foreign importations," approved March 3, 1865, shall be construed to include any ship, vessel, or steamer to or from any port in the Sandwich Islands or Society Islands.

The third section provides that so much of an act entitled "An act to authorize protection to be given to citizens of the United States who may discover deposits of guano," approved August 18, 1856, as prohibits the export thereof, is hereby suspended in relation to all persons who have complied with the provisions of section two of said act, for five years from and after the 14th of July, 1867.

The fourth section repeals all laws and parts of laws allowing fishing bounties to vessels hereafter licensed to engage in the fisheries; provided, that, from and after the date of the passage of this act, vessels licensed to engage in the fisheries may take on board imported salt in bond to be used in curing fish, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, and upon proof that said salt has been used in curing fish the duties on the same shall be remitted.

The fifth section provides that from and after the passage of this act all goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston and Portland, or any other port of the United States which may be specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the adjacent British Provinces, may be entered at the custom-house, and conveyed in transit through the territory of the United States without the payment of duties, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

The sixth section provides that imported goods, wares, or merchandise in bond, or duty paid, and products or manufactures of the United States, may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the Provinces aforesaid, be transported from one port or place in the United States to another port or place therein, over the territory of said Provinces, by such routes, and under such rules, regulations, and conditions, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the goods, wares, and merchandise so transported, shall, upon arrival in the United States from the Provinces aforesaid, be treated in regard to the liability to or exemption from duty or tax as if the transportation had taken place entirely within the limits of the United States.

The seventh section provides that whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that more moneys have been paid to the collector of customs, or others acting as such, than the law requires, and the parties have failed to comply with the requirements of the fourteenth and fifteenth sections of the act entitled "An act to increase the duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that said non-compliance with the requirements as above stated was owing to circumstances beyond the control of the importer, consignee, or agent making such payments, he may draw his warrant upon the Treasurer in favor of the person or persons entitled to the overpayment, directing the said Treasurer to refund the same out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The eighth section provides that the provisions of the second, third, and fourth sections of the act approved March 2, 1833, entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," and of the twelfth section of the act approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more certain and speedy collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes," shall be taken and deemed as extending to and embracing all cases arising or which may have heretofore arisen, and all suits and prosecutions heretofore brought and now pending, or which may hereafter be brought against any officer of the United States or other person by reason of any acts done or proceedings had by such officer or other person, under authority or color of the act approved March 12, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property, and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," or the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection;" provided that such acts done or proceedings had under the two acts last aforesaid, or under color thereof, shall have been done and had under the authority or by the direction of the Executive Government of the United States; and provided further that when a recovery shall have been, or shall hereafter be, had in any such suit or prosecution brought, or which may hereafter be brought, as aforesaid, the payment of the amount recovered, as provided for in the said twelfth section of the act approved March 3, 1863, aforesaid, shall be made out of the moneys arising and obtained from the proceeds of sales and leases and fees collected and paid over to the Government under the two acts approved March 12, 1863, and July 2, 1864, aforesaid, in relation to captured and abandoned property.

The ninth section provides that in determining the dutiable value of imported merchandise, except in cases herein otherwise provided for, there shall be added to the cost, or to the actual wholesale price or general market value at the time of exportation in the principal markets of the country from whence the same shall have been imported into the United States, the cost of transportation, shipment, and transshipment, with all the expenses included from the place of growth, production, or manufacture, whether by land or water, to the vessel in which shipment is made to the United States; the value of the sack, box, or covering of any kind in which such goods are contained; commission at the usual rates, but in no case less than two and a half per cent.; brokerage, export duty, and all other actual or usual charges for putting up, preparing, and packing for transportation or shipment. And all charges of a general character incurred in the purchase of a general invoice shall be distributed pro rata among all parts of such invoice; and every part thereof charged with duties based on value shall be advanced according to its proportion, and all wines or other articles paying specific duty by grades shall be graded and pay duty according to the actual value so determined; provided, that all additions made to the entered value of merchandise for charges shall be regarded as part of the actual value of such merchandise, and if such addition shall exceed by ten per cent. the value so declared in the entry, in addition to the duties imposed by law, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of twenty per cent. on such value; provided, that the duty shall in no case be assessed upon an amount less than the invoice or entered value.

The tenth section provides that the second proviso in section twenty-one of an act entitled "An act increasing temporarily the duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1862, which provides that any goods remaining in public store or bonded warehouse beyond three years shall be regarded as abandoned to the Government, and sold under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in case of any sale under the said provision, to pay to the owner, consignee, or agent of such goods, the proceeds thereof, after deducting duties, charges, and expenses, in conformity with the provision of the first section of the warehouse act of August 6, 1846.

The eleventh section provides that during the period of one year from the passage of this act, there may be imported into the United States, free of duty, any machinery designed solely for and adapted to the manufacture of sugar from beets, including all the preliminary processes requisite therefor, but not including any machinery which may be used for any other manufactures.

The twelfth section provides that upon the reimportation of articles once exported of the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, upon which no internal tax has been assessed or paid, or upon which such tax has been paid and refunded by allowance or drawback, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty equal to the tax imposed by the internal revenue laws upon such articles.

The thirteenth section provides that there shall be established in and attached to the Department of the Treasury a bureau to be styled the Bureau of Statistics, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to appoint a Director to superintend and conduct the business of said bureau, who shall be paid an annual salary of $3,500; that it shall be the duty of the Director of the Bureau of Statistics to prepare the report on the statistics of commerce and navigation, exports and imports, now required by law to be submitted annually to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury; and said report, embracing the returns of the commerce and navigation, the exports and imports of the United States to the close of the fiscal year, shall be submitted to Congress in a printed form on or before the 1st day of December next succeeding; and the said Director, as soon as practicable after the organization of this office, shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, prepare and publish monthly reports of the exports and imports of the United States, including the quantities and values of goods warehoused or withdrawn from warehouse, and such other statistics relative to the trade and industry of the country as the Secretary of the Treasury may consider expedient; that the Director of the Bureau of Statistics shall also prepare an annual statement of vessels registered, enrolled, and licensed under the laws of the United States, together with the class, name, tonnage, and place of registry of each vessel, and such other information as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem proper to embody therein; and to enable the said Director to furnish the information required, the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power, under such regulations as he shall prescribe, to establish and provide a system of numbering all vessels so registered, enrolled, and licensed; and each vessel so numbered shall have her number deeply carved or otherwise permanently marked on her main beam; and if at any time she shall cease to be so marked, such vessel shall be no longer recognized as a vessel of the United States; that the said Director shall also prepare an annual statement of all merchandise passing in transit through the United States to foreign countries, each description of merchandise, so far as practicable, warehoused, withdrawn from warehouse for consumption, for exportation, for transportation to other districts, and remaining in the warehouse at the end of each fiscal year; that it shall be the further duty of said Director to collect, digest, and arrange, for the use of Congress, the statistics of the manufactures of the United States, their localities, sources of raw material, markets, exchanges with the producing regions of the country, transportation of products, wages, and such other conditions as are found to affect their prosperity; and to aid him in the discharge of these duties, the several clerks now employed in the preparation of statistics in the Treasury Department, or any bureau thereof, may be placed under his supervision and direction; and, in addition, the Secretary of the Treasury shall detail such other clerks as may be necessary to fully carry out the provisions of this act; and that the expenses of the Bureau of Statistics for clerical service, publication of reports, stationery, books, and statistical periodicals and papers required by the bureau, shall be defrayed on the order and approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and that all letters and documents to and from the Director of the Bureau of Statistics, relating to the duties and business of his office, shall be transmitted by mail free of postage.

Mr. MORRILL. The present bill embraces those sections in the last part of the tariff bill recently passed by the House, and which was postponed by the Senate. They are provisions which in the main have met the approval of a large majority of this House.

This bill proposes a tariff on but three articles, one of which is cigars. Our internal revenue tax upon cigars is higher in some particulars than is the duty upon imported cigars, and it is manifest that some additional legislation should be had in relation to that article.

The next article is cotton. The duty of five cents per pound, now fixed upon cotton, was so fixed when it was supposed the internal tax would be five cents per pound. No duty is needed for the protection of American cotton, but it is manifestly proper, when we levy an internal tax upon any article that at least an equal amount of duty for revenue purposes should be levied upon any foreign importation of the article, and the only description of cotton which is likely to be imported is the Surat cotton, worth not more than about two thirds as much as American cotton.

Three cents per pound is also the sum allowed as a drawback on manufactured cottons exported, and if now adopted will harmonize and make symmetrical all our laws on this subject.

Another article is distilled spirits, which are now imported, merely colored, and styled "essences," whereby a great amount of fraud is committed on the Canadian frontier. It is in order to reach this class or description of spirits which may be thus fraudulently introduced that the provision of this bill was introduced into the original tariff bill and has been inserted in the present bill. In connection with this subject, and in order to prohibit the introduction of distilled spirits in very small parcels, I am directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move an amendment by way of a proviso, which also is similar in its terms to a provision embraced in the tariff bill as passed by this House.

I move to amend by inserting at the end of the first section the following:

Provided, That brandy and other spirituous liquors may be imported in casks or other packages of any capacity not less than thirty gallons; and that wine in bottles may be imported in boxes containing not less than one dozen bottles of not more than one quart each; and wine, brandy, or other spirituous liquors, imported into the United States and shipped after the 1st day of October, 1866, in any less quantity than herein provided for, shall be forfeited to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I rise to a point of order, and inquire whether this bill should not, under the rules, be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The House dispensed with the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole. The gentleman will find by referring to the Globe that the bill was by unanimous consent made a special order in the House.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, the second section of this bill is simply the provision which was incorporated in the tariff bill at the suggestion of the gentleman from California, [Mr. McRuer.] The effect of it is that vessels engaged in the trade with the Sandwich Islands shall not be subjected to taxation for each voyage, but shall pay an annual tax in the same manner as our lake and coasting vessels now do. I think there will be no objection to this.

The third section is in relation to allowing the importation and exportation of guano.

The fourth section has reference to the abolition of the bounties allowed to our fishermen, and also proposes to allow a drawback on the salt actually used in curing fish. The present duty on dry cod-fish is only half a cent per pound; and the cost of the salt used in curing the fish is nearly as much as the duty on fish, and if duties shall be required to be paid on the salt used our fishermen would have an unequal contest. Whether this provision be incorporated in the law or not the fishermen can easily evade paying the duty by procuring salt in the Provinces. There can be no doubt of the propriety of the provision, and I think there will be no objection to it, especially when we consider that the tendency will be to keep down the price of one article of cheap food.

Sections five and six have relation to our railroad traffic of merchandise and produce through the Canadas without payment of duties. It is proposed to allow to the Canadians the same privilege of transporting merchandise across our territory which they accord to us.

The object of the seventh section is that parties who have made accidental overpayments of money for customs may have the excess refunded.

The eighth section is intended for the benefit of our internal revenue officers who have been collecting duties for some years past upon cotton, and in some cases recently they have been sued in the southern State courts for the recovery of the money thus collected. This section simply provides for the transfer of such suits into the courts of the United States.

The next section relates to the ascertainment of the value of imported merchandise. A similar provision has already been passed by the House. I desire only to offer an amendment to strike out in the second and third lines the words, "except in cases herein otherwise provided for."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to know from the chairman of the committee what necessity exists for the enactment of the seventh section.

Mr. MORRILL. I have already explained that the section is designed to provide for the repayment of money erroneously paid for customs.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would like to know whether there are now any cases of that kind.

Mr. MORRILL. There are.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It seems to me that under that statement this is only a convenient way of paying claims against the Government of the United States. Here are parties who, it is alleged, have paid money in excess of what was due to the Government; and this section enables the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to those persons the money which they are claiming without having their claims investigated by Congress. It does seem to me that that is a provision that ought not to be put into a tariff bill.

Mr. PIKE. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to allow me to offer a proviso to the fourth section providing for a duty of one cent per pound on cod fish.

Mr. MORRILL. I cannot yield for that purpose. I am fully aware that the bill now contains all that we can hope to have passed in the Senate.

Mr. PIKE. This subject was under the consideration of the House.

Mr. MORRILL. There are very many subjects which sadly need our action at this session, and which I would have been glad to have included if we could have had our own way in this bill, wool for instance; but I am informed by members of the Senate, who are authorities on the subject, that it is entirely useless to include anything on such subjects, and that if we do include them the bill will be coldly laid aside until next December.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I would like to include iron too.

Mr. PIKE. I desire, with the permission of the gentleman from Vermont, to call the attention of the House to section four of the bill, repealing the fishing bounties. I know that a great many members of the House will rest easier when they learn that the fishing bounties are already really repealed.

Mr. MORRILL. The only other section of importance, or to which I deem it necessary to call the attention of the House, is the last section, providing for a Bureau of Statistics. This is for the use and benefit of this House, and will, I trust, have no opposition. And now, Mr. Speaker, as these sections have all or very nearly all already been acted upon by the House, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the gentleman will allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I must decline to yield. Mr. BINGHAM. Then I hope the House will not second the demand for the previous question, and I call for tellers on the second. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORRILL and BINGHAM were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 25.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. SPALDING. Is it in order to move to postpone this bill until the first Monday in December?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, the previous question having been seconded.

Mr. SPALDING. That is what the Senate will do with it.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would like to hear from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means some explanation of the eighth section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont is entitled to an hour to close the debate, and can explain it if he pleases.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to discuss the general subject. In relation to the eighth section of the bill, I repeat, as I have already stated, that collectors of internal revenue who have collected money as the tax upon cotton, are in some instances prosecuted in the State courts for the recovery of that money, and the courts are receiving such suits. This section merely transfers those suits to the United States courts. I do not desire to discuss the bill any further.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, as the gentleman from Vermont will not permit us even to have our amendments read.

Mr. BINGHAM. I want my amendment read.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 50, noes 45.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

The amendments reported by the Committee of Ways and Means were then agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MORRILL. I now demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay the bill upon the table. There has been no opportunity to offer amendments at all, and I do not wish such a bill passed.

Mr. LE BLOND. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 33, nays 82, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baker, Bingham, Boyer, Dawson, Donnelly, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Kuykendall, William Lawrence, Le Blond, McCullough, Nicholson, Noell, Pike, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Ross, Schenck, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Henry D. Washburn, James F. Wilson, and Wright—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Bidwell, Boutwell, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Deming, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Ketcham, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McKee McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Price, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Shellabarger, Thayer, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Ward, Warner, William D. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, Windom, and Woodbridge—82.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bromwell, Buckland, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Eckley, Ferry, Finck, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, Kasson, Kelso, Koontz, Latham, Marshall, Marvin, McIndoe, Niblack, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stevens, Stillwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Elihu B. Washburne, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, and Winfield—67.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. LE BLOND. Is it in order to move to postpone the bill to a day certain?

The SPEAKER. It is not, because the House is acting under the previous question.

Mr. LE BLOND. This bill proposes to upset a great many laws, and ought not to be passed in a hurry.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, being upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. LE BLOND demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 36, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Plants, Price, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Warner, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, Windom, and Woodbridge—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baker, Benjamin, Boyer, Buckland, Dawson, Defrees, Eldridge, Farquhar, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Humphrey, Johnson, Julian, Kerr, Kuykendall, Le Blond, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Pike, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, James F. Wilson, and Wright—36.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Baldwin, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Ferry, Finck, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, Kasson, Kelso, Latham, Marshall, Marvin, McIndoe, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Rogers, Schenck, Shanklin, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stillwell, Strouse, John L. Thomas, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Stephen F. Wilson, and Winfield—59.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. DELANO. I rise to a question of privilege. I submit the following resolution, upon which I call the previous question:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 25th day of July, at twelve o'clock m.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope the motion to lay on the table will be agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a question of order, that this resolution is not a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. A resolution for the adjournment of Congress is always regarded as a privileged question when the House is not engaged in the consideration of other business.

Mr. DELANO. I call the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] allow me to move to amend his resolution by adding that the House hereafter meet at eleven o'clock a. m.?

Mr. ASHLEY of Ohio. Make that a separate resolution.

Mr. DELANO. At the suggestion of some friends, I modify my resolution so as to read "23d" instead of "25th;" and that hereafter the House will meet at eleven o'clock a. m.

Mr. DAWES. We do not want a concurrent resolution for that.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise to a point of order, and that is that the last clause of the resolution, as modified by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] relating to the hour of daily meeting of the House, is not a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order; that portion is not a privileged question.

Mr. DELANO. I will withdraw all my modifications, and submit the resolution in its original form.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. DELANO called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 52, nays 78, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Bidwell, Bromwell, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Donnelly, Driggs, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Abner C. Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, Morrill, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Stevens, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—52.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Barker, Benjamin, Bingham, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hart, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Longyear, McCullough, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Perham, Pike, Plants, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, and Wright—78.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Baldwin, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Chanler, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Finck, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, Kelso, Laffin, Marshall, Marvin, McIndoe, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Shanklin, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stillwell, Strouse, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, and Winfield—52.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] yield to me that I may move an amendment to strike out "the 25th" and insert "the 23d"?

Mr. DELANO. I am willing that the sense of the House shall be taken on the proposition; and I yield for that amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the word "fifth" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "third," so as to provide for an adjournment on the 23d of this month.

Mr. DELANO. I now renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Would it be in order Mr. Speaker, to move that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. It will be, if the previous question should not be seconded.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the resolution and the pending amendment be laid on the table; and on the motion I demand the yeas and nays. I want it to be seen by the record who are ready to stand by their posts and who are not.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 56, nays 75, not voting 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Bromwell, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Driggs, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Koontz, William Lawrence, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, Morrill, Morris, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—56.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Benjamin, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hart, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Longyear, McCullough, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Perham, Plants, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, and Wright—75.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Baldwin, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bundy, Chanler, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Finck, Goodyear, Grider, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Jones, Kelso, Loan, Marshall, Marvin, McIndoe, Moulton, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Rogers, Shanklin, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Woodbridge—51.

So the House refused to lay on the table the resolution and pending amendment.

The previous question then recurred on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. DAWES, to strike out "the 25th" and insert "the 23d."

Mr. BROMWELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

On agreeing to the amendment there were—yeas 50, noes 50.

The SPEAKER voted in the negative; and the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the resolution.

Messrs. FARNSWORTH and INGERSOLL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 57, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Barker, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hart, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Longyear, McCullough, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Woodbridge, and Wright—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Bromwell, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Donnelly, Driggs, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Abner C. Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McKuer, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Francis

Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—57.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Baldwin, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Finck, Goodyear, Grider, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jones, Kelso, Marshall, Marvin, McIndoe, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, Rogers, Shanklin, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, and Winfield—48.

So the resolution was adopted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ROSS said: Is it in order now to have the resolution of the caucus read? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to interrupt the roll-call after a response has been made.

Mr. LE BLOND. My colleague [Mr. FINCK] is detained at his house by illness.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to change my vote for the purpose of reconsideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] will be entitled to the floor for that purpose.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to ask a question. If the gentleman from Ohio moves to reconsider, will it be in order to move to postpone the question on his motion to reconsider until some day in the future?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio will probably move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. Does the gentleman change his vote?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not unless I can make the motion I desire.

The result having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I demand the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 59, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Barker, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hart, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Longyear, McCullough, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Pike, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Woodbridge, and Wright—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Bromwell, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Donnelly, Driggs, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Woodbridge, and Wright—59.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Baldwin, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Finck, Garfield, Goodyear, Grider, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Jones, Kelso, Marshall, Marvin, McIndoe, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Shanklin, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, John L. Thomas, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, and Winfield—61.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter of the Clerk of the House in regard to the execution of an order of the House; which was laid on the table:

CLERK'S OFFICE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 18, 1866.

SIR: In accordance with the resolution of the House of Representatives, I have this day presented to the Secretary of State the act entitled "An act to continue in force and to amend an act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWARD McPHERSON,

Clerk of House of Representatives United States.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had indefinitely postponed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 156) to amend the ninth section of the act entitled "An act to increase the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, and for other purposes;"

An act (H. R. No. 701) granting a pension to Mrs. Imogene Buckingham, of Edgar county, Illinois;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 46) for the relief of Martha McCook;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 188) for the appointment of a commission upon transportation between the western States and the Atlantic sea-board; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 20) requesting the President to suspend any order mustering out the officers of the Veteran Reserve corps until Congress shall take some legislative action in regard to the corps.

The message also communicated the proceedings of the Senate upon the announcement of the death of Hon. JAMES H. LANE, late a Senator from the State of Kansas.

DEATH OF SENATOR LANE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
July 18, 1866.

Resolved, That the members of the Senate have learned with regret and sorrow of the sudden death of Hon. JAMES H. LANE, late a Senator from the State of Kansas.

Resolved, That as an evidence of respect to the memory of the deceased, and of sincere sorrow and sympathy for his bereaved and afflicted family, the Senate do now adjourn.

Ordered, that the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, with unusual frequency we have been called upon during the session now drawing to a close, to pause at the portals of the tomb, and to pay the last tribute of respect to those who have mingled with us in the business of legislation. The inexorable summons to the eternal world, which sooner or later must come to us all, has been recently heard in both Houses of Congress, and vacant seats remain to remind us of the uncertainty of all earthly hopes, and the final termination of all human ambition and human conflict.

The sad duty now devolves upon me of formally announcing to the House an event already known—the death of Hon. JAMES H. LANE, one of the Senators of the United States from the State of Kansas. The manner of his death was such that it seems to be peculiarly proper that I should briefly refer to some of the circumstances attending the sad event. On the 11th of June he left Washington for the last time. For several weeks previous to his departure his mental condition excited the serious apprehensions of his friends. Those who knew him best, and were conversant with his wonderful mental and physical characteristics, saw in him a change which excited their most serious apprehensions.

His friends were hopeful that a change of scenery and relaxation from his senatorial duties might restore his health and give quiet to his mind. On his arrival at St. Louis his symptoms grew worse instead of better; but he proceeded to his home at Lawrence, and for the time being it seemed that his vigorous form was stronger than his disease, and he in a measure threw off both his physical and mental prostration. Transacting business with great rapidity, he determined to return to his place in the Senate. He reached St. Louis on the 19th of June, only to find himself prostrated with increasing illness. Skillful physicians were at once called to his relief. They found him suffering severely, both in body and mind. He refused to see company, seemed to be impressed with the idea that his mind was failing him, and expressed the wish to go to an insane asylum. Restless and dispirited, and against the advice of his attending physician, who accompanied him, he started on the 27th of June for his home, his family having already been apprised of his alarming condition. During the progress of the journey his conversation frequently indicated insanity. On his arrival at Kansas City he took the boat for Leavenworth, instead of going to his home at Lawrence. Proceeding to the house of a relative in the suburbs of the city, he remained in a condition of mental aberration till the occurrence of the fatal act on the evening of July 1, which terminated his existence.

JAMES H. LANE was born at Lawrenceburg, Indiana, on the 22d of June, 1814. His father, Amos Lane, was a lawyer of distinction; was at one time Speaker of the Indiana House of Representatives, and was a member of this House under the Administrations of Andrew Jackson and Martin Van Buren. The mother of Senator LANE was a native of New England, and was possessed of a poetic mind and of fine attainments. I have often heard him speak of her, even in the wild excitements of political conflicts in Kansas, and always in terms of the highest filial reverence and affection. At the age of twenty-six young LANE was admitted to the bar. Long before that he had taken an active part in party politics on the Democratic side.

At the time of his admission to the bar he was postmaster at Lawrenceburg, Mr. Van Buren being then President of the United States. In the contest between that statesman and General Harrison, LANE took the stump for the former, and established his reputation as one of the most effective and popular speakers in the West. He was an ardent advocate of the election of Mr. Polk, and when the Mexican war came on, in 1846, it found him ready to enter the field and fight in the service of his country. At this time he was thirty-two years of age. He was elected colonel of the third Indiana regiment of volunteers by the general vote of the men. His regiment formed a part of General Taylor's army of invasion, and participated in the hard-fought battle of Buena Vista, for which both the regiment and its gallant commander received the highest encomiums of superior officers. After two years of service, with depleted ranks, Colonel LANE returned with his regiment to Indiana. He at once organized the fifth regiment, with which he returned to the field and marched with the army of General Scott to the city of Mexico. In after years he spoke with great pride of the bravery of the Indiana volunteers; and during the late contest he always took great delight in their brilliant achievements. He had a pride of commandship which always belongs to the true soldier. I never knew a man who fought under him in Mexico ask of him a favor but what he granted it in his power.

In 1848 he was elected Lieutenant Governor of Indiana. In 1852 he was elected a member of this House in the Thirty-Third Congress. At the same time he was also elected a presidential elector at large on the Democratic ticket. Coming to Congress in 1852, he was necessarily active in the Kansas-Nebraska struggle. Following the lead of Stephen A. Douglas, he accepted the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and voted for the Kansas-Nebraska bill. But though he acted with his party, by which means he wrecked his political fortunes in Indiana, he nevertheless said, on the floor of this House, on the 13th of March, 1854, "I am no advocate of slavery; I am no slavery propagandist."

From his seat in the House of Representatives, and following the suggestions of Mr. Douglas and other party leaders, Colonel LANE went to the newly organized Territory of Kansas. He went as the advocate of the doctrine of squatter sovereignty and for the purpose of organizing a national Democratic party on this basis in the new Territory. He was disappointed in all his efforts in this direction, and with a keen perception of the nature of the struggle he abandoned the leadership of Democracy when it pointed to a forcible establishment of slavery in Kansas. From the hour he first arrived on the soil of Kansas, in April, 1855, he commenced a life of wonderful activity. He sought at once for leadership, and obtained it, even among those who seemed to be his opposites. The commanding position he early obtained in the ranks of the Free-State party is in itself one of the best proofs of his great power as a popular leader. The ability of Senator LANE was in no part of his diversified career so marked as in the ease with which he won and in the firmness with which he maintained his position as a leader among a people so active, enthusiastic, and intelligent, as gathered together in Kansas, impelled by a conscientious conviction that they were fighting a battle which could only end in the triumph of universal freedom.

At the organization of the Free-State party the late Senator was chosen chairman of the executive committee. In the canvass which followed he bore the most prominent part, speaking daily, sleeping often in the open air, and resorting to every possible expedient to avoid the ruffians who followed his footsteps and sought his life. The Free-State movement soon took form in what was known as the Topeka constitution. State officers and a Legislature were chosen, and JAMES H. LANE and Andrew H. Reeder were elected United States Senators. In the exciting events which followed Senator LANE acted as military commander of the Free-State forces, and joined with that grand old crusader of Freedom, John Brown, in counseling active resistance to the murderous propagandists of the slave power. But the crisis passed by the retreat of the ruffians to Missouri.

Senator LANE came to Washington with the Topeka constitution. Our country was passing through a historic period. The nation was profoundly stirred by political agitation. While here the startling news came of the wanton sack of Lawrence by an armed mob aided and encouraged by United States officials. Senator LANE hastened from this city. Events moved rapidly forward in Kansas. The troops were used to disperse the State or Topeka Legislature. The Free-State leaders had all been arrested or had fled the Territory. The printing offices were destroyed and the newspapers were silenced. The Missouri river was blockaded and all the direct avenues of immigration were held by the armed minions of the slave power. In this hour of gloom Senator LANE was marching across Iowa at the head of several hundred armed emigrants, and when all seemed lost to freedom, he entered Kansas from the northern border and once more confronted the enemies of free institutions on their chosen battleground. The events of this period are full of transcendent interest, in all of which Senator LANE acted a prominent part. When success was assured he left the Territory to avoid a collision, and unwilling to embarrass Governor Geary in his movements to deal justly with all parties.

Senator LANE returned to Kansas in March, 1857. In the canvass then progressing, he confronted Governor Walker, speaking from the same stand, and everywhere upholding and defending the integrity and policy of the Free-State party. During the Leecompton struggle, preliminary and otherwise, he was foremost in counseling, speaking, organizing. It was in the summer of 1857, at a convention at Topeka, that he used an expression which aptly expresses both the power he had and the reason for it. He had been denouncing the Democratic party for its subserviency to slavery, when, rising to his full height, he declared with fiery manner and thrilling tones, "that as for himself his efforts would never cease till this party was shattered; and until from the Yellowstone in the North to the Gulf in the South, one line of free States should be reared, an impenetrable barrier against which the cursed waves of slavery should dash themselves in vain. Until that time comes," he said, in tones that swayed his audience like a rushing wind, "I am a crusader for Freedom!"

In 1857 he served as president of the Leavenworth constitutional convention, and in March, 1861, was chosen United States Senator under the accepted constitution. His thorough devotion to his country and to his State in the Senate and in the field during the late struggle, is well known to all, and I will not repeat the history here.

There was one political act of his life which I believe Senator LANE sincerely regretted—I mean his final vote against the civil rights bill. One who knew him well, and who was with him at the time, thus writes:

"We know that he saw and felt keenly the mistake he had made. Nor was this consciousness the result of the general disapproval of his action on the part of his constituents. On the very day the vote was given, handing the writer a telegram from the editors of the Chicago Tribune, which advised him to vote for the bill, and warning him that he would make the mistake of his life should he vote against it, he exclaimed, 'Ah! the mistake has been made; I would give all I possess if it were undone.'"

Mr. Speaker, I have thus spoken of the main incidents in the life of the dead Senator. His restless and fiery spirit has passed beyond the bounds of time. Let it be mine to draw the mantle of charity over all his faults, and let the voice of public criticism be hushed in the solemn silence of the tomb. Mr. LANE was made a Senator of the United States from the new State of Kansas, because from the hour he first espoused the Free-State cause, he served it with unquestioned fidelity, with ceaseless energy, and with that unflinching hope and confidence which belonged to an ardent nature. From the inception of the contest till the final victory was won, in sunshine and in storm, hunted by the pro-slavery assassins from Missouri, and by the attempted assassins of Freedom in the employ of a corrupt Administration, Mr. LANE labored right on to the end with unshaken confidence.

It is for this part of his career, as the leader of an oppressed but earnest people, struggling against the injustice of power, that he deserves to be and will be remembered with earnest gratitude. All over the broad prairies of the young Commonwealth I have the honor to represent, watered with the blood of the martyrs of freedom, there are those who struggled and suffered and hoped and sacrificed with him, in stern resistance to the monstrous attempt to fasten the crime of slavery upon her virgin soil. Each and all of those feel sad to-day, in remembrance of him who shared in all their sufferings, and who pledged with them all of life and health and fortune that Kansas might be free.

The time has not yet come for the impartial historian to write the history of that great struggle for freedom which, commencing on the western bank of the Missouri, and seeming to involve at first but the liberty of a State, only ended in that mighty conflict of arms from which we have but just emerged. Amid the historic splendor of great achievements, and the bloody fury of embattled conflicts, let us remember the sublime heroism, the dauntless energy, and the unwavering faith of the Free-State settlers of Kansas, who crossed the prairies, as of old

"The pilgrims crossed the sea,
To make the West, as they the East,
The homestead of the free."

Sir, I have spoken too long already. But I would not fail to do that full justice due from the living to the dead. On Saturday, the 13th instant, the mortal remains of Senator LANE were borne to their last resting-place on a beautiful eminence overlooking the city of Lawrence, followed by a stricken family, and by a vast concourse of his friends and fellow-citizens. Forgetting the political asperities and errors of the past, a whole people united in honoring the memory of one who served his adopted State with restless energy, and who for ten long years was her faithful servant and defender. It is fitting that he should sleep beneath the soil of the State he loved so well, and that the good he did on earth should thus be remembered by a grateful people.

I submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the United States has received with deepest sensibility intelligence of the death of Hon. JAMES H. LANE, late Senator from Kansas.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this House in relation to the death of Hon. JAMES H. LANE be communicated to the family of the deceased by the Clerk.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, as the Representative of the fourth congressional district of Indiana, I arise to respond to the announcement of the death of Senator LANE of Kansas, under circumstances both painful and embarrassing. It was in the district from which I come that he was born and spent the years of childhood and early manhood. It was there that the pioneers knew him as the prattling child, and their offspring as associate at the festive board and comrade in arms, as they bore triumphantly our "starry banner" to the capital of a sister republic. It was there his happiest days were spent, under the influence and benign care of a pious Christian mother, and unrestrained society of his highly educated and accomplished sisters that the gentler qualities of his iron nature were cultivated and developed. It was there that he first gave evidence of those remarkable powers of endurance that enabled him to successfully compete with all opposition in whatever field of enterprise he embarked. It was there that he first drew his maiden sword and led to the field the stalwart comrades in arms, who won with him at Buena Vista their full share of the imperishable glory of that hard-fought field. It was there that he developed in repeated contests his acknowledged preëminence as one of the most successful political debaters of the age, who never made a canvass but in triumph.

Senator LANE was born at Lawrenceburg, Indiana, in June, 1814, and was the son of Hon. Amos Lane who represented that district in the Congress of the Republic. His father was widely known as a prominent Democratic politician of Indiana, and a successful lawyer of more than ordinary abilities. It was in the bitter contests of the old Whigs and Democrats, in which his father took a conspicuous part, that the Senator, then a youth, became inspired with the love of politics which in after years fashioned and molded his character, habits, and actions, culminating in eminent success and calamitous death.

Senator LANE was emphatically a man of the people. With the politicians he never was popular, but while in Indiana sustained successfully a war for preëminence with those of his own party. With the people he was a great favorite and successfully enlisted them in his behalf in every contest in which he participated, and served as Lieutenant Governor, senatorial elector, and as Representative in the Thirty-Third Congress from my State.

It was not his forte to inaugurate and mature the policy of his party, so much as to study and follow the lead of the people, and thereby seemingly, at least, become the champion of their favorite measures. He was a bold, fearless, and successful advocate of whatever cause he championed, and the friends of human freedom on the western border have lost an able leader in the great cause to which they and he showed so much devotion and made so much sacrifice. He was a self-made and self-reliant man who scorned dependence on others, appreciating, if not boasting, with confidence, the sentiment—

"Thy spirit, Independence, let me share;
Lord of the lion heart and eagle eye,
Thy steps I follow with my bosom bare,
Nor heed the storm that howls along the sky."

As a military leader he was beloved by those who served under him. In Mexico, and especially at Buena Vista, in command of the third Indiana infantry, he won with those under him imperishable glory, as in the last charge of our enemy on that to them fatal day his regiment did invaluable service on their flank, while the grape of Captain Bragg arrested their desperate charge in front.

That he had military genius of high order and was born to command is attested by the fact that when Kansas was overrun by border ruffians, and the gallant men that saved her were in arms, on the morn of that memorable day when Lawrence was threatened, his extreme lines were sixty miles apart and well in hand at the hour of attack. "None but a military genius could have concentrated them as he did," said a gallant officer of the regular Army, who has since given his life for the Republic. The result was the overthrow of the border ruffians and permanent triumph of the party of Freedom in that beautiful garden spot of liberty. The devotion of the men who served with him in Kansas attests his services to that noble young State. He fought its battles, shared its fortunes, served its people, and received its honors. His restless spirit is still forever, and that iron form so familiar to his associates in the camp, the Senate Chamber, at the bar, and the social board, reposes beneath the soil of his adoption that he defended so well. Would that it had gone out differently, in the forefront of battle, with armor on and victory perching on our banners.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, I feel that I ought not to allow this occasion to pass without saying a few words.

General LANE's ancestors, like mine, were among those who first penetrated the wilderness of that region of country which has since become the great State of Indiana; and although my personal acquaintance with him did not commence in early life, yet I have had with him for many years an agreeable acquaintance and pleasant personal relations.

I have also been associated with him in legislative positions which have brought me more or less in contact with him. My first personal acquaintance with him commenced in the year 1849, at the time when he was inaugurated as Lieutenant Governor of the State of Indiana. I was then a member of the House of Representatives of that State for the first time. The year following I was elected to the Senate of the State, of which he was the presiding officer by virtue of his position as Lieutenant Governor of the State. I served as a member of the Senate during the remainder of his official term. Before that I had only heard of him as the gallant colonel of two of our favorite Indiana regiments, and I only knew him by reputation. My acquaintance thus formed with him continued until the time of his death. Although I was never personally intimate with him our personal relations were always kind, and differing, though we often did, the exciting questions which have occupied the public mind since that time never disturbed our kindly relations.

I can say, and say with truth, that General LANE was, in all the relations of life in which I knew him, a marked man. He was not a learned man; he was not so cultivated as others; but he was a man of strong will, of great force of character, of indomitable energy, and of high ambition. He always became a central figure in any movement in which he was engaged, and he always bore a prominent part in any enterprise with which he connected himself. As a political leader, although apparently bold and reckless, he was in truth a discreet and prudent man. I always conceived him cautious in devising his plans and mapping out his future life, but bold and resolute in the execution of those plans, never deterred by any dangers which seemed to threaten him personally or by any consequences which might result to him. From what I knew of him, I could not regard him in any other light than as a man of both physical and moral courage.

As a military leader, his courage, I presume, is unquestioned, and the other conflicts in which he engaged and which have been spoken of here to-day, I think sufficiently established his reputation as a man of moral courage. It is not my purpose to refer to those scenes which have been portrayed by the gentlemen who have preceded me. They take one view of those questions, and I, perhaps unfortunately to myself, take the other view. But while thus advocating these other views, and differing from General LANE as I have done, I am not the less willing to bear testimony to those traits of character which have made him so prominent in the political history of the country for the last fifteen or twenty years. As I have remarked, he was a man of ambition. He struggled hard to obtain that political prominence and power and influence which in the later years of his life he possessed. After years of unremitting struggle, after passing through one of the most remarkable contests in the history of this country, he succeeded in obtaining a position which gave him influence and power in the councils of the nation. He became a member of the Senate of the United States, and was continued for many years preceding his death in a position which many of the best minds of the country have been willing to devote a large portion of the best years of their lives to attain—a position that would gratify the ambition of most men.

Possessing so much, therefore, as would seem to have endeared life to an ambitious man, the struggle must have been a fearful one, the despair must have been terrible, which induced him to lay violent hands upon himself and become the destroyer of his own life. Of all the forms in which death can come, none is so mysterious and terrible as the one by which his life was closed. It is hard for us to conceive that one so gifted and occupying so exalted a position should grow so weary of life. But by his own act he has passed away from among us. As has been well remarked by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. CLARKE,] it is our duty, a duty which ought to be strictly observed, to draw the veil of charity over all his faults and failings, and the misfortunes, whatever they may have been, which darkened the close of his career.

As a citizen of the State of Indiana, before he emigrated to the far distant Territory, he was already a marked and distinguished man. And in the great struggle of life through which he has passed, he has given evidence of some of the highest traits of manhood. Indiana cannot be insensible to the great loss which Kansas has sustained in his death. I therefore bear my willing testimony to much that has been said in his behalf by those who have preceded me on this occasion. As a citizen of Indiana, I have to express my profound regret at the sad termination of so active and eventful a life as his has been. I very heartily second the resolutions which have been offered.

The resolutions were then adopted.

And thereupon (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. EGGLESTON: The memorial of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company and the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, asking a loan from the Government of $1,000,000 in bonds, to aid the canal company to complete said canal.

By Mr. WILLIAMS: The petition of 41 citizens of Armstrong County, Pennsylvania, praying for such an amendment of the tariff as will protect American labor to the extent of the difference between the cost of capital and labor abroad and at home.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 19, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

BRIDGES ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yesterday, in the amendment of the bill relating to bridges over the Mississippi river, in giving the name of a corporation in the State of Illinois I gave it—it was so furnished to me—as the Hancock County, Illinois, Bridge Company. I understand that the name of the bridge company is the Hancock County Bridge Company, and the word "Illinois" ought not to be in it. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have that correction made, so as to leave out the word "Illinois." I suppose there will be no objection to it, and by unanimous consent the correction may be made. It is a mere verbal one.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is it to amend the bill?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I gave the name of the corporation opposite Keokuk wrongly yesterday by inserting the word "Illinois." The name of the corporation is the "Hancock County Bridge Company," and I gave it as the "Hancock County, Illinois, Bridge Company." The word "Illinois" is not in the charter. The title as furnished to me was wrong, and I ask that that word be taken out of the name of the company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, that verbal correction will be made.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I present a petition of non-commissioned officers and privates in the volunteer army of the United States, enlisted in 1861 and 1862, and who have been honorably discharged, praying for the passage of an act giving them additional bounty, so as to make the amount received by them equal to that received by those who enlisted in 1863 and 1864. That subject having been reported upon, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW presented a petition of citizens of Berwick borough, in the county of Columbia, State of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of an act refunding to that borough certain bounty moneys paid by it; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of mechanics and laborers in American manufacturing establishments in Philadelphia, praying for an increase of the duties upon imported foreign goods; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask leave to withdraw the petition of Salmon B. Colby that I presented a short time ago. It has not been acted upon, and the petitioner now desires to withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Leave will be granted, if there be no objection.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 103) in relation to the pay and accounts of collectors of revenue who have failed to take the required oath of office, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 399) relative to collection districts in North Carolina, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 400) to fix the compensation of certain collectors of customs, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 365) granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands in the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada, reported it with an amendment.

POST ROUTE BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 775) to establish certain post roads, have instructed me to report it back with certain amendments; and I should like to have the bill considered and the amendments disposed of, as it is late in the session.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the permission of the Senate, the amendments reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads will be taken up in their order, as the bill is being read through at the desk, and acted upon as they shall be reached in their order.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was to strike out lines twelve, thirteen, and fourteen, in the following words:

Massachusetts:
From North Palmouth, via Hatchville and East Palmouth, to Waquoit.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to the end of line one hundred and eighteen.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have had a request made to me, since the reading of the bill was commenced, to defer its consideration until to-morrow with a view of allowing an examination of some of its provisions, and I have agreed to do so. I move, therefore, to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 440) to reorganize the Navy Department and fix the pay of its officers; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That Friday, the 20th instant, be assigned for the consideration of matters of legislation relating to the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the time fixed?

Mr. MORRILL. To-morrow, after the morning hour.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope that will not be done. It is impossible to tell at this period of the session what the necessities of the session may be. The House has passed a resolution to adjourn on Wednesday next, and it will be very unsafe, in my judgment, to set aside any particular day for any particular business. If the Senator can pass his bills at any time without such an assignment, I shall be very glad of it; but I think we have legislated in its due proportion for the District of Columbia during this session.

Mr. MORRILL. My colleague is very much mistaken. There never was so little District business done, I think, at any session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is impossible to assign a day for the consideration of such business now, with the public bills pending and undisposed of; several of them of great importance. To-morrow, if I am not able to do it to-day, I hope to be able to pass the new tariff bill which will come here from the House, and which it is absolutely essential should be passed, and to which there will probably be some amendments. If at any time my colleague can get in the District business without fixing a day for it, I shall not object; but at this period of the session, with probably only a few days left, I do not think it safe to set aside any day for its consideration. If the Senator would ask for an evening session I would not object.

Mr. MORRILL. I have not the slightest objection to that. I will amend the resolution so as to make the District business the special order for to-morrow evening at seven o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should have no objection to the resolution as it stands if my colleague would only say that he would give way to the public business.

Mr. MORRILL. I would not think of antagonizing the District business with the public business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I have no sort of objection to the resolution.

Several SENATORS. Say to-morrow evening; that will be a good time.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well; I will say to-morrow evening at seven o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is in the power of the mover to amend or modify it.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I will modify it so as to make it read, "that Friday evening, the 20th instant, at seven o'clock, be assigned," &c.

Mr. STEWART. Will that cut off any other business from being transacted?

Mr. MORRILL. No.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

SUFFERERS BY THE PORTLAND FIRE.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill introduced by me for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in Portland, Maine.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 428) for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in Portland, Maine.

It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be purchased such provisions and clothing and such other articles as he shall deem advisable, and to tender the same in the name of the Government of the United States to the State of Maine, for the relief of the citizens who have suffered by the late fire in the city of Portland in that State, and appropriates a sum not exceeding $50,000 for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following as a substitute:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to tender to the Governor of the State of Maine, in the name of the United States, for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in the city of Portland, $50,000, to be used in such manner as he may think best.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. President, if a measure like this is to pass, the sooner it is done the better. The fire at Portland was unexampled in its destruction, covering miles of streets, and has thrown upon the world, houseless and impoverished, thousands of citizens. The individual contributions that have been made throughout the United States, I see, are not adequate to meet the immediate wants of the people.

I find that in 1827, after the occurrence of a destructive fire at Alexandria, Congress passed a bill in this language:

"That the sum of $20,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of the indigent sufferers by the fire in the city of Alexandria."

Prior to that time, in 1812, when a town in Venezuela was almost entirely destroyed by an earthquake, and the citizens were left without any immediate provision, this law was passed:

An act for the relief of the citizens of Venezuela.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be purchased such provisions as he shall deem advisable, and to tender the same in the name of the Government of the United States to that of Venezuela, for the relief of the citizens who have suffered by the late earthquake.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That a sum not exceeding $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treas-any not otherwise appropriated, to carry into operation this act.

Approved May 8, 1812.

And subsequently, when Ireland was so much afflicted and brought to a state of starvation, although we appropriated no money for the purpose of relieving those who were suffering at that time, we directed two ships of the United States to be used for the purpose of transmitting to Ireland the contributions which the citizens throughout the country made for that end, and it answered a very excellent purpose. I do not know any mode by which the moral strength of the country can be so much increased as by these acts of charity to our citizens who by a visitation of Providence have been subjected to so sad and afflictive a suffering. I hope, therefore, the bill will be passed at once.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a very unpleasant duty to interpose any objection to a bill of this character intended to relieve the sufferings of any portion of the people of this country occasioned by a great calamity; but the Congress of the United States is not a charitable institution, and the Treasury of the United States is not to be used simply as a dispenser of charity. Now, sir, where is this to stop? What is to be the line? We have already, at the present session of Congress, and since this dreadful fire in Portland, passed one or two resolutions for the benefit of the sufferers. We have passed one resolution authorizing the furnishing of tents and other accommodations from the quartermaster's department. We have passed another resolution or bill relieving the parties from the payment of taxes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Only suspending the collection of taxes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is relieving them for a time by delaying the collection of taxes. Now the Senator from Maryland comes in with a proposition to pay out of the Treasury of the United States $50,000 in money to these sufferers. Sir, you can hardly take up a newspaper in the United States that you will not see an account of a fire somewhere. Where is the line? Where is the distinction? If you commence appropriating money to distressed people who have been burned out, you cannot stop at Portland. There was a very large fire at Chicago the other day. I have seen a statement that several hundred thousand dollars' worth of property was destroyed at a single fire that has occurred there within a week or ten days. Fires are occurring all over the country. Now, does the Senator from Maryland mean to relieve all those sufferers?

I know it has been complained of in some quarters that the Congress of the United States is disposed to arrogate to itself all power, to take charge of all charities; and in advocating some measures which I have thought it my duty to go for I have been charged with getting up a great charitable institution. This charge was made in reference to the Freedmen's Bureau bill, a necessity growing out of the war; but here is a thing of ordinary occurrence, and it seems to me that there is such a thing as carrying a matter of this kind to the extreme; and as ungracious as it may seem, and as unpleasant as it is to take such a position, I cannot consent to appropriate money out of the Treasury of the United States in a case like this, upon the information which we have; and I should like to know if this bill comes from any committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. It does not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I suppose we are as competent to decide upon the question now as we shall be after it has been referred to the Committee on Finance. The two cases to which I have called the attention of the Senate my friend from Illinois has not noticed. One was an act passed in 1827, giving $20,000 for the relief of sufferers from a fire in Alexandria, and the other was an act passed in 1812 appropriating $50,000 for the relief of sufferers by an earthquake in Venezuela, at Caracas, I think, and both bills passed, as far as I can see, without any objection. The principle is precisely the same. My friend from Illinois I have no doubt opposes this bill upon what he considers to be grounds of duty; but he could not help thinking, when making the objection, that perhaps he had himself recommended legislation which was as obnoxious to objection as this could be. He recommended the Freedmen's Bureau bill, and we have passed it. That provides for the education and the maintenance of colored people and refugees, and, instead of taking $50,000, perhaps it will take some twenty millions. My friend has no doubt as to the constitutionality of that measure or as to the expediency of that measure, and the other day he voted, and a majority of the Senate voted for a continuance of that bureau for two years after the period when it would have expired by the original limitation.

I am not finding fault with the motive of that; but I say that if there ever was a case of charity, one resting alone upon the motives that influence us in doing acts of charity, that was one. Now, I want to know if that law was right, if that law was expedient, why it is not equally right and expedient that we should relieve these people? I know that we cannot provide for all the people who suffer loss by fire. There must be some mode of distinguishing between the cases. This is a loss by fire such as never occurred anywhere else. It is a loss, the sufferings caused by which cannot be provided for, and hardly mitigated, by individual contributions of citizens of the State in which it occurred. Millions upon millions of property have been destroyed; everything belonging to the people themselves has been destroyed and they left penniless and houseless upon the world, and looking to charity alone to relieve them from the calamity which Providence has seen proper to involve them in.

It seems to me, Mr. President, to be right in itself, to be what the Government should delight to do if it has the power to do it, that we should contribute in this way. We see now that the individual contributions that are being made throughout the country are very inadequate to the wants of the people. Most of the insurance, I understand, was in the local offices, and the loss was so extensive that many of the offices may fail to respond. At any rate, the insurance will be paid to the owners of the houses who are, perhaps, able to bear the loss; but there are thousands and thousands of people there without a dollar, as I understand. I see no necessity for referring the bill to the Committee on Finance in any event, however, and I hope the Senate will act on it at once without a reference.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me there is no sort of analogy between the appropriation made for the support of the Freedmen's Bureau establishment and this bill. This is a pure charity.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the other?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I only spoke of the other because the Senator from Maryland and those acting with him opposed the Freedmen's Bureau bill. Are those appropriations, made for the safety of the nation, to be compared to a fire in one of our cities? Here are four million beings whose condition affects the safety of the Republic; four million people made free by the results of the war, an element which affects the whole nation and the safety of us all. Is the safety of the nation at stake, or is a whole race at stake in consequence of a fire that has occurred in one of our cities? Sir, there is no analogy between the two cases. I did support the Freedmen's Bureau bill. I thought there was authority, and ample authority, in the Constitution of the country for that measure. The southern States are to-day under military control; it is necessary to support the Army in the southern States; and we are taking care of the refugees, both white and black. This bureau is not simply for the black; it is for both white and black who have been reduced to poverty in consequence of the war. What is this case? It is a pure charity, and nothing else.

But the Senator tells us that an earthquake occurred once and Congress appropriated money to the sufferers. That would be very unlike a fire. A fire is a thing of ordinary occurrence; fires occur every day in some of the cities of this Union; earthquakes but very seldom. The danger of such a precedent is very different in appropriating money to sufferers from a fire to what it would be in the case of a calamity of nature of that kind. Earthquakes are not of frequent occurrence. The one is an act of God; the other an act occurring through human instrumentalities. I do not suppose that human beings have very much to do with the occurrence of an earthquake.

Mr. JOHNSON. We have political earthquakes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is true we have some political earthquakes, and I presume the Senator from Maryland has been shaken perhaps by some of those tornadoes, and that is the reason that he referred to this earthquake of nature.

Now, sir, I think the precedent is a bad one. Congress has already shown the sympathy of the nation with the sufferers at Portland. I think we have gone far enough. I have not looked at the precedent to which the Senator refers, nor at the debate which occurred on the occasion of the passage of that resolution; but I trust that this bill will not pass without being examined by some committee of this body to see upon what grounds we can make such an appropriation.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall feel constrained to vote against this bill. I shall do it with exceeding reluctance. There is no object for the appropriation of money that commends itself more deeply to my heart than an appropriation for the relief of the sufferers by the Portland fire. But, sir, I do not concede that Congress has any power whatever to make such an appropriation. It seems to me that we have, or ought to have, a Government of a constitutional character, in which the whole power of Congress is definitely laid down, and I know of no authority in the Constitution that would sanction Congress in making any such appropriation.

I recollect the precedent that was made in connection with the earthquake at Caracas, and also that for the relief of the sufferers by fire at Alexandria; but this is not a Government of precedents; it was never intended so to be; and there cannot be any more dangerous principle established in our Government than that precedents shall make constitutional law. I utterly protest against any such position. I concede, as the Senator from Maryland has assumed, that there was no authority whatever, according to my reading and comprehension of the Constitution, to authorize the charities voted in the Freedmen's Bureau bill; and the fact that Congress chose, according to my judgment, so far to disregard constitutional restrictions and to grasp power not conceded to it by that instrument as to make those appropriations, instead of being an argument with me to do the same thing now, is an argument that would have a restraining influence upon my mind and judgment. It shows the proneness of Congress, from various considerations, to transcend the powers that it possesses by the fundamental law of the Government. I think it is time for Congress to retrace its steps in relation to the licentious interpretation which it has been giving to its powers under the Constitution. If I thought there was a power, (even if I entertained some doubt about the existence of the power,) on the part of Congress to make this appropriation, I would vote for it with the greatest degree of alacrity and pleasure; but notwithstanding that this is an object that commends itself so strongly to my sympathies, a sense of duty and of obligation to act within the powers conferred upon Congress by the Constitution will constrain me most reluctantly to vote against it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If this bill is to be referred at all, I would rather have it referred to some other committee than the Committee on Finance. From the fact that I am on that committee, and might be considered as interested in a question of this kind, I think it would be improper to refer it to that committee. I would prefer that it should be sent to some other committee, although I do not know how it will be any better understood by being referred to a committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I certainly would not object to the reference to any committee of a subject about which we needed the advice of a committee; but each Senator is perfectly able to decide for himself the two questions which this proposition involves: first, whether we have the power to pass it; and secondly, if we have the power, whether it would be expedient to pass it. Beside the two cases to which I referred, I forgot to refer to the case of the earthquake that occurred and destroyed the lands in the New Madrid grant, as it was termed. Congress passed a law giving the sufferers lands of an equal amount and of equal value. Several instances of similar appropriations have occurred. When by a calamity—not an earthquake in the sense in which my friend from Illinois refers to the case at Caracas, but when there was an explosion at the arsenal here, and some twenty or thirty persons were killed or maimed, we passed an act making a contribution for the benefit of those who survived and were suffering, and for the benefit of the children and representatives of those who were killed.

Now, as to the question of power, there may be something in it, but for the soul of me I do not exactly see it. I cannot imagine how the question of power can in any measure depend upon the fact whether the occasion which calls for a charitable appropriation of this description has been caused by an earthquake or by a fire. We grant it, if we grant it at all, because of the result, not because of the cause of the result; because of the ruin in which the people have been involved, the distress in which they have been placed, and their inability to provide for their actual wants; and whether that calamity or distress arises from some elementary strife or arises from a fire, which may or may not be owing to the carelessness of man as to the purpose of man, is perfectly immaterial. We have the money, and if we have the right to appropriate money for any purpose of this description, it is because of the purpose, because it is an occasion invoking the charitable aid of the Government; and no matter how the occasion has been brought about, whether by the aid of man in any way, directly or indirectly, or whether by the direct interposition of Heaven, is immaterial. We come to their relief, provided it be true that the parties are in a situation which calls upon us to relieve them if we can.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Things unlike each other are often quoted as precedents. Now, the Senator from Maryland, astute as he is, and seeing a distinction at a glance, quotes as a precedent for this bill an appropriation made by Congress for the relief of those who were injured by the blowing up of the arsenal. Is there any analogy between them? Those parties at the arsenal were in the Government employ. He might as well say that the granting of a pension to a soldier furnished a precedent for an appropriation to be given to persons who had suffered from fire in no way connected with the Government. There is no analogy between them.

The Senator says he does not know why the bill should be referred. It should be referred to know, if an appropriation is to be made at all, something about the circumstances. Can the Senator from Maryland inform me what the loss at Portland is? I understand that in the city of New York alone there is more than a million of insurance. How much of this property was insured in other cities I do not know. It seems to me that before we vote money out of the Treasury of the nation we should know something about the extent to which this suffering goes.

Again, sir, I understand that private contributions have been made all over the country in aid of these sufferers. I am glad to see it. It exhibits a proper disposition on the part of the people. I am as much for it as the Senator from Maryland, and will contribute as liberally, according to my means, as others to relieve the suffering of these people. I would much prefer doing it in that way rather than voting money out of the Treasury.

Mr. GRIMES. Did not the Government relieve the New Madrid sufferers?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it did.

Mr. GRIMES. Where is the difference between that case and this?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I tried to state the difference. That was an act of God, and we relieved them by granting them lands.

Mr. GRIMES. Is not this?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No; a fire is not regarded as an act of Omnipotence exactly. I take it that human instrumentality has something to do with these fires; but I do not suppose that human instrumentality had anything to do with the earthquake which destroyed New Madrid; and in that case, I understand, Congress relieved the parties by granting to them land. I do not recollect that they gave them money out of the Treasury; and the Senator from Iowa will remember that the Constitution expressly authorizes Congress to dispose of the public lands, and we have always been in the habit of giving them away.

Mr. GRIMES. Have we not the same right to dispose of money?

Mr. TRUMBULL. We can appropriate money, but it must be for objects contemplated by the Constitution, I take it.

I was, however, commenting upon the propriety of sending this bill to some committee. Does the Senator from Maryland know the extent of the contributions throughout the country? They amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars; I think more than a hundred thousand dollars in the city of New York alone, and a large sum in Boston, and in all the cities. I think we ought to know that there is a pressing necessity for it before we vote money in this way. We ought to have the information which a committee could gather in reference to that matter; and it was for that reason that I moved to refer the proposition to a committee. If it is to pass at all, let us know what sum we ought to appropriate to relieve this suffering, if we have the authority to appropriate anything, which I do not think we have. I quite agree with the Senator from Kentucky that the fact that Congress has once made an appropriation, even if it were precisely like this, does not make this one constitutional; that we are not a Government of precedents, and the fact that a bill has once passed Congress improperly does not authorize all future Congresses to pass similar bills.

Now, sir, as I said when I interposed the objection to the passage of this bill, it is a very thankless task to oppose a bill designed as a charity for suffering people; but, according to my sense of duty, it is improper for Congress to appropriate money in this way. I do not see where it is to stop. If fifty thousand dollars is to go to the great fire of Portland, ten thousand dollars may go to-morrow to a similar fire in Bangor, and five thousand dollars the next day to a fire in my city, and a million the next day to a fire in Baltimore or in New York.

Mr. CONNESS. Leave out California.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume they have so much money there in the earth that they would never come to the Treasury of the United States for money to take care of their sufferers from fire.

Mr. CRESWELL. Has the bill been reported by a committee?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It has been before no committee but was introduced by the Senator's colleague on his own responsibility. As the Senator from Maine objects to the bill going to the Committee on Finance, as he is from the city of Portland, and is at the head of that committee, I will move its reference to the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is varied, and it is now moved that this bill be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not propose to take any part in this discussion, and I do not feel called upon to object to any course that gentleman may see fit to take. I wish to say, however, in reply to the Senator from Illinois, that it will be impossible to get any exact estimate at the present time of the loss by this fire. The nearest we can come at it is the account that is kept in our papers. The most recent intelligence, as stated in the papers—and they have made the best estimate they could—is, that the loss was about ten million dollars in the city of Portland, that the insurance amounted, so far as had been ascertained, to between three and four millions; and that the contributions up to date were something short of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. WILSON. I hope this bill will not be referred to any committee. I think every member of the Senate can comprehend it without getting the opinion of any committee of the body upon it. It is a very simple proposition. A dreadful calamity has fallen upon the city of Portland. A large amount of the wealth of that city has been destroyed. It is true, as stated by the Senator from Maine, that a large amount of this property has been insured; but hundreds of poor families have lost their all, and are thrown out into the world dependent wholly upon the charity of the people of the country. These calamities will sometimes come upon the country. I do not believe this nation will be any the poorer for giving a little charity to those upon whom these great misfortunes fall. They come once in a while. It can certainly do no great harm, when they do come, for this nation to bestow a little of its means to relieve the destitute and the suffering; and if we do it, I have no fear that we shall be any the poorer for it. It will be an expression of the action of the nation and may have its influence upon the charitable among the people to induce them to relieve the wants of those who have been borne down by this great calamity. Whether it has come by the providence of God, or the folly of man, or from any other influence, it is upon them, and I certainly hope we shall pass the bill introduced by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. HENDERSON. I apprehend that the Senator from Illinois is hardly in earnest in his motion to refer this bill to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I cannot imagine what that committee has to do with a proposition of this character. I suppose it is not intended that the money shall go out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I thought this was a contingency. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the Senator will select some other committee, if he insists upon referring the bill to any committee. I apprehend that the Senator from Maryland intended by the introduction of this bill to make a small appropriation for the immediate necessities of these people. It is objected that we cannot say but that all the sufferers by the fire are fully insured, and that therefore this appropriation may be wholly unnecessary. Now, we all know perfectly well that many months will elapse before the claims can be adjudicated in the insurance offices; and we know, furthermore, that not over one half the property was insured at all, as was very justly remarked by the Senator from Iowa; and in addition to that we know that the property which was insured was not insured for its full value. Hence it is clear that even if the parties find themselves dealing with solvent insurance companies, able to pay them the amount of the insurance, they will not be remunerated more than one half the extent of their loss.

I do not know the number of families that are turned into tents, their houses having been entirely destroyed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think from twelve thousand to fifteen thousand people.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am aware that we have fires all over the country; there have been a great many this summer; but no such extensive fire as this has occurred in our country recently, perhaps not since the great fire in New York in 1835. This is a dreadful visitation, one that perhaps will not occur again in half a century. From twelve to fifteen thousand people have been turned out of doors. Not only have their houses been burned, but I presume that they found it utterly impossible to remove their household and kitchen furniture; and it was all entirely destroyed; and these people are now placed in tents where they are without the necessities of life. The men are kept employed from day to day in endeavoring to provide their families with the necessities of life, instead of running around after broken insurance companies to get the little that they will get from those companies. This is a proposition to appropriate the small sum of $50,000. If there is a case that upon the face of it appeals to the charity of the members of the Senate, I think this is the case.

I am not very particular in hunting up a provision of the Constitution to authorize me to vote for an appropriation of this character. If I can find that past Congresses have exercised the power and that the present Congress has exercised a similar power, I shall not hesitate, when these poor people are calling upon the charities of the whole country, to go to the extent that I am permitted to go under the Constitution. I think that there are numbers of precedents for this bill. I believe that in addition to the precedents cited by the Senator from Maryland, a few years ago, at the time of the Irish famine, we appropriated money for the relief of the Irish people; at least we furnished vessels at the Government's expense to transport from this country provisions necessary to save those people from starvation. I have not turned to the legislation on that subject, and perhaps there was no actual appropriation of money made by Congress, but relief was afforded in the way I have described; and it is certainly strange, if we can at Government expense relieve the sufferings of the people of another nation, that we cannot relieve the sufferings of our own people.

I hope this bill will not be referred to any committee, and that a test be not made of it, but that it be passed at once. I can see no objection to it. There are numerous precedents for it. Although, as was very properly said by the Senator from Kentucky, this is not a Government of precedents, yet precedents are much in legislation. They at least show that gentlemen whom we must take to be as wise, as capable, and as patriotic as ourselves have done these things heretofore. Of course we necessarily rely much upon precedents. It will not do to say to any lawyer that he must not rely upon precedents. I apprehend that we all rely upon them to a very great extent; and the interpretations of the Constitution given by past Congresses add much force to the arguments that may be made in favor of the proposition before us.

Mr. President, I, for one, would be willing, in consideration of the fact that private charity has done so little for these people, to extend the amount proposed to be appropriated. We desire to put these people as soon as we can in a position to pay their taxes to the Government, and if it becomes necessary to make this appropriation in order to accomplish that object, I apprehend we have the power to do it, and it is good policy to do it. Under these considerations, I hope the Senate will proceed at once to pass the bill.

Mr. WILSON. The unfinished business of yesterday, which is of course the special order for one o'clock, I hope is not to be displaced by this debate, but I will consent to let it go over informally for a few minutes to allow this bill to be disposed of.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let us take the vote.

Mr. DAVIS. If my friend from Missouri will refer me to any provision of the Constitution which, according to my judgment, gives a seeming power to Congress to pass this bill I will vote for it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not desire to take up the constitutional question. There is an older work upon this subject perhaps than the Constitution. We find twelve thousand suffering people, poor, unable to provide the means of daily subsistence to themselves; and we are told by an older constitution than this that he that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord; and my friend from Kentucky had better be laying up some treasure of that sort. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUCKALEW. I suppose that the proper motion to be supported by those who are unwilling or unable to vote for this measure would be one to postpone it. I see no propriety in referring it to the committee which has charge of the expenditures of the Senate alone.

Mr. President, a few years ago the large and flourishing town of Chambersburg in my State was burned to the ground. The greater part of it was destroyed, not by the act of God, by mere accident or casualty, but by the act of the public enemies. It was done at a time, too, when the Government of the United States had stripped our Commonwealth of her whole armed force; our soldiers were under the control of the military authorities of the United States and remote from our borders. In that defenseless situation, caused by our responding to the appeal of the General Government, our State was invaded, and one of our large, flourishing, wealthy, and interesting towns was swept from the face of the earth by fire. Great destitution and suffering fell upon our people.

If there ever was a case when an appeal could be made to the General Government for relief and for aid because of the destruction of property by fire, that was the case. All the circumstances surrounding that calamitous event would have appealed powerfully to this Government for aid and for relief to our people, because that act was caused by the default of this Government in defending our territory; it was caused by the act of this Government in withdrawing those forces which would have defended us on our borders, and indiscreetly and unwisely disposing of them in such situations that we were not protected.

Not one dollar has this Government contributed to those sufferers or to reimburse our people for the property destroyed on that occasion. If our people of Pennsylvania possessed twelve votes in this body instead of two, it is possible that some appeals would have been made here and strongly pressed—appeals to the charity of the Senate for relief or for reimbursement to us for the injuries which we suffered. Instead of that, sir, what has been done? Private liberality was appealed to to alleviate the suffering which fell upon our people, and subsequently our State Legislature appropriated half a million dollars to pay for the property thus destroyed, and destroyed under circumstances that if there was any fault at all, it was a fault that rested upon this Government, and not upon the government or people of Pennsylvania.

Now, sir, the difficulty, the pressing and sharp difficulty, which is in the mind of every reflecting member against voting for a measure of this kind is, that there is no boundary, no limit to the exercise of a charitable power of this description. You cannot distinguish between cases of casualty or of accident in different parts of the country, and administer a system of charity from this point upon any intelligent and upon any fair principle of justice. It will always be a system of favoritism if you enter upon it. In responding to some appeal in case of famine in Ireland, or some total destruction of a great city in Venezuela, there are limits to the charity of the nation. This is one of the Powers of the earth, and in its capacity as a member of the family of nations you may, perhaps, infer some color of power for charity of that description. But in exercising this power among the States of our Union, in distributing our charity and our bounty where suffering appeals to us in the various States, we are entering upon a field of expenditure, we are entering on the exercise of a power which has no limit, no boundary, no rule, no equality, and finally, to sum it up in a word, no principle of justice by which you can be certain that your bounty will be administered in a proper manner and that it will reach the proper persons.

Now, sir, we are unacquainted with the special facts of this great disaster. We know that it is one enormous in its magnitude and most afflicting in its character, but I think that the State of Maine herself should stand forward upon this occasion. Being possessed of all the facts pertaining to this great calamity, and being specially interested in it as the governing authority, having jurisdiction in the place where the disaster happened, she should step forward and administer such relief and extend such public bounty to the sufferers in this case as is appropriate; and when she has done that she will have done no more than other States of this Union have done under similar circumstances.

At all events, sir, as at present advised, I am obliged to say that so long as such cases as the destruction of Chambersburg are existing facts in our recent history I am unable to bring my mind to that frame which will enable me to vote for this measure.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that the honorable member from Pennsylvania should have intimated that in offering this bill there was any political purpose on my part or on the part of any member of the Senate. It seems to me extraordinary that, no matter what the subject is, some of us are very apt to suppose that our associates are influenced by party motives. I rise to disclaim it in this instance, not only in my own behalf, but in behalf of the members from New England. There was not one member of the Senate, as far as I am advised, who had any knowledge of my purpose to introduce the bill—certainly, not one who ever approached me with a request that I would introduce it—until I mentioned it on the very day that the bill was introduced. It was prompted by my own sense of what was due from the nation to the sufferers. Whether New England had twelve votes in this body, or had only, as Pennsylvania, two votes, had no influence whatever on me.

The honorable member from Pennsylvania tells us, not so much questioning the power as questioning the exercise of the power under the circumstances, that he is unable to vote for this appropriation as long as Chambersburg is unprovided for. Whose fault was it that the Congress of the United States did not provide for Chambersburg? Did the honorable member ask for an appropriation of that description?

Mr. BUCKALEW. It would have been laughed at.

Mr. JOHNSON. Laughed at! It would not have been laughed at as far as I was concerned. But, Mr. President, Chambersburg stands in very different situation from that in which the sufferers by this fire stand. That was the result of war, and it is impossible for any Government to indemnify against the consequences of war. The nation would be bankrupt if it undertook to provide an indemnity against injuries resulting from the progress of war; and the honorable member is, I hope, mistaken in supposing that the forces were withdrawn from the State of Pennsylvania for the purpose of leaving her helpless.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I made no such assertion. I said they were injudiciously placed, so that our defense was not, as it ought to have been, made perfectly secure.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a military question. I am not so certain that my friend from Pennsylvania, skilled as he is in everything else, is quite equal to the management of armies. Whether they were unskillfully placed or skillfully placed, is a matter in regard to which I should rely more upon the judgment of the men in whose hands the management of the armies was placed than upon the judgment of any civilian. Pennsylvania ought to have been able to protect herself, and she would have been able to protect herself, in the main, although unable to guard against a sudden invasion of her territory by an organized force, such as was the force led on that occasion by the confederates.

But what has that to do with this question? The honorable member does not seem to deny that we should have a right now to provide for the case of Chambersburg, if we thought proper; but he concludes by saying that as long as Chambersburg remains unprotected for, so long, as far as he is concerned, are the people of Portland to remain in a helpless, impoverished, and starving condition.

I rose, however, simply for the purpose of saying that the Senators from New England are no more responsible for the introduction of this bill than is the honorable member from Pennsylvania; in other words, they are not responsible at all.

Mr. DAVIS. I think with the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, notwithstanding the protest of the honorable Senator from Maryland, that every man's property that has been destroyed by the rebels furnishes a stronger case for the interposition of Congress to indemnify the loss than this case or any other case of casual fire can.

Sir, I respond to the position of the Senator from Pennsylvania that it was the duty of the Government of the United States to protect its citizens in their persons and their property against the aggressions and the destruction of the rebels, and an omission to furnish that protection, by reason of a careless or improvident disposition of the troops or for the want of the necessary force, does not release the Government, in the case of the destruction of private property by the rebels, from the deep and strong obligation, as I conceive, to make full indemnity for the property.

I understand that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania only adduced the case of the town of Chambersburg, in his State, as an example. It is only one of a million. Every city, every town, every habitation that was left in flames and destroyed, and every instance of the destruction of private property by the rebels, because of the absence on the part of the Government of giving the necessary defense to that property, in my judgment is a much stronger case for the interposition of the Government to indemnify the loss than this or any other case of casual fire can be. I think that the honorable Senator's position in that respect, and his adducing the example from the State of Pennsylvania, furnishes a powerful and, to my mind, a conclusive consideration against the passage of this measure.

Mr. BUCKALEW. If the Senator from Illinois does not choose to insist on his motion to refer this measure, I will submit one to postpone it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I withdraw the motion to refer.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then I move to postpone this bill for the present.

Mr. JOHNSON. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If this appropriation be made at all, I suppose it ought to be made at once. From the very nature of the case the relief ought to be granted now, if ever; but I am not prepared to vote for it. I wish I could. I cannot see how we can appropriate the public money to local charities. I suggest, therefore, to the Senator from Illinois to move the reference of this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. The author of the measure is a member of that committee; the Senator from Illinois is the chairman of that committee. He opposes the measure, and its author advocates it. The bill will then go before that committee for its examination, and I presume the committee would be willing to meet at any hour to decide upon it, and if it be within the power of Congress, in the opinion of the committee, the bill can be returned here at once, receive immediate action, and perhaps become a law at this session. If Congress decides that the appropriation ought to be made, I should wish to make it at this session. Therefore, if the Senator from Pennsylvania will withdraw his motion, I will substitute for it a proposition that this measure be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have no objection to withdraw my motion, but will renew it in case the other is not successful.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well. I am not able exactly to see, however, why the Senator from Illinois objects to this bill, because he voted the other day for a bill distributing charities over eleven States of this Union to persons who had been declared to be citizens, to occupy toward the Government the same relation exactly that the people of Portland do; and the appropriation was made because of their necessities. If I had voted for that bill, it seems to me I could not well oppose this; but as I was not able to see the constitutional authority for that appropriation of the public moneys, I am not able to see how we can alleviate the citizens of Portland, however earnestly the case may appeal to our feelings.

As has been well said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, there is no limit to this sort of appropriation. Congress decides that it may relieve in cases of hardship. An appeal will be made to you at every session, and I presume the applications will increase in number and in amount at every session. When we once yield the point that because people in particular localities need money Congress can give it to them, there is then no limit to govern the action of Congress, and that is precisely the case. It is stated that the people in Portland need money, need money because of a terrible affliction. That is all there is of it. Because they need money we are to give it to them, not in the exercise of any power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution, but simply because our charitable feelings are appealed to by their distresses we are to give them money. That is all there is of it. I cannot respond to that appeal; I wish I could; but I cannot see the power to appropriate the money.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I was in hopes that we should have determined this question without debate and without any great deliberation, because in my judgment the more you undertake to deliberate on a question of this kind, the more you detract from the merits of your action. If there is any gentleman here whose heart does not prompt him at once to vote for such a bill as this, of course let him vote against it; but let us not put it over, let us not talk over it, let us not drag in the Constitution. Such things have been frequently done. When a great, overwhelming calamity has fallen upon the people in any particular place in the United States, on several occasions, to my certain knowledge, since I have been here, Congress, being in session and having the means, has stepped in and alleviated in some measure the effects of the calamity where it could be done, and the nation never felt that it had performed such most graceful acts. In this case when I know the extent of the great calamity that has fallen on these people, such as scarcely ever fell on a community before, perhaps the greatest by fire that has ever fallen upon any portion of this country, I feel prompted at once to vote for some measure of relief. All their means of support have been swept without notice from under them in a moment, and they are now at the charity of the world, many of them who were before in independent circumstances. In this District of Columbia when there was extraordinary weather, and great distress fell upon poor people on account of it, Congress has on several occasions to my knowledge stepped in and alleviated their distress, and I never heard that the Government was any worse off for having done it. I never yet heard of a man being injured by an act of generosity like this. These acts are such as commend a Government to the people and show that the Government sympathizes with the welfare of the people and also with their calamities. While they cost you nothing they elevate the Government in the estimation of the people.

I am for doing this act and doing it at once. I did not intend to say a word about it, and I did not suppose when the bill was called up that it would be deliberated upon for a single moment. I supposed that the act would be done promptly. I am ready to do it. I do not fear that it will set an example or precedent that will be dangerous to the well-being of this Government. I wish such precedents could be set oftener than they are; they would endear the Government of the United States to the hearts of the people. Let relief be extended when these great, overwhelming calamities occur. Where they are not so great but that the benevolence of the surrounding communities can relieve the sufferers, there the Government does not step in; but upon a great occasion like this there is no civilized Government that would withhold its aid, and I hope of all others ours will not. I trust the bill will pass.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it is unpleasant to object to a bill such as this which is now before the Senate, because measures of this kind always commend themselves to the heart, even when the judgment generally condemns them. I presume there is not a Senator upon this floor who would not be glad to believe that he had authority to make this appropriation. There can be nobody who does not sympathize, and sympathize deeply, with the people of Portland in their affliction. I speak candidly when I say that if I believed I had the right as a member of the Senate to vote for this bill I would do it, and do it cordially, cheerfully; but, sir, I do not believe that I have the right to cast that vote. I do not believe that the Congress of the United States have the right to appropriate money out of the public Treasury for any such purpose; and entertaining this opinion I could not vote for the proposition, though all my kindred had been inhabitants of Portland and lost their all.

Mr. President, if you have the authority under the Constitution to appropriate money to the inhabitants of Portland who suffered from the recent disastrous fire, you have the same authority to appropriate money out of the public Treasury for the benefit of every private individual in the United States whose house is burned down, whose furniture is destroyed by fire or through accident. The number of people congregated in Portland does not distinguish it in principle from the case of any private sufferer in the United States. If, simply because there are hundreds and it may be thousands of persons in the city of Portland who have suffered from this conflagration, you must vote $50,000 to relieve them, how can you deny relief upon the application of a single private person who has lost his all by a like affliction? Because a number of individuals assembled at Portland en masse, living in a populous town, lost their all, you are to extend bounty to them. If they had lived in different neighborhoods and a fire had occurred and they each separately had lost their all in different States of the Union, you would never have thought of making an appropriation of this kind. The fact that they all happened to be living on the same spot, near each other, does not distinguish their case from the case of a private individual.

I should not have said a word if the yeas and nays were not to be called upon this question. If the Senate had chosen to pass this bill sub silentio, I should have said nothing; but as I have to record my vote I wished to state the reasons why I must vote against the bill, though I feel as sympathetic and as kindly toward these people as any of those Senators who will vote for the appropriation.

Mr. HOWE. I should not have said a word upon this subject if the yeas and nays had not been called for; but as I have got to vote against the bill, and as I hate to give that vote worse than almost any vote I ever gave, I feel bound to say in a few words why I do it.

It seems to me we have made a mistake of some kind. If it is for us to administer the charities of the nation, I do not see why we do not go at it systematically, and ascertain how large the claim of the city of Portland is upon the charity of the nation, and pay it right up. That it has a claim for more than $50,000 I have no manner of doubt. I suppose there is not a member upon this floor who has not felt called upon to consider the question of his own ability, and to determine for himself how much he could afford to do to relieve that distressed city. Why should individual members have contributed a dollar? Why not vote at once out of the Treasury of the nation whatever is required to make that loss good or to meet the necessities of the people impoverished through that great calamity? But I have always believed that it did not belong to us, to the Legislature, to administer mere charity. I am not troubled by any constitutional scruples. I have no doubt of our constitutional authority to appropriate money for this purpose as well as for any other purpose for which we do appropriate it; but I do not think our constituents intend that we should administer their charities; that we shall determine how charitable they ought to be; that we shall determine how much money they ought to contribute for one charity or another. I do not think they delegated to us any such authority, or that they expect from us any such exercise of power.

The magnitude of this calamity not only appeals to the sympathies of us all, but it is very likely to overwhelm our judgments. An immense amount of property was destroyed. It impresses us as an awful dispensation, and we all feel the necessity of doing whatever is proper to be done to relieve against its effects. It seems to me that we had better, each one of us, however, administer our own generosity, our own charity, and speak for ourselves individually. For myself, distant as that point is, knowing it as well as I once did, familiar with it as I once was, I have felt called upon to consult with my landlady and see how much of my salary I could devote to the matter of furnishing relief. But while I feel at liberty to do that, I do not feel at liberty to vote a dollar of anybody else's money, and I do not think the statute referred to by the Senator from Missouri furnishes us that authority. I do understand, as he said, that those who give to the poor do lend to the Lord and become His creditors; but I understand that that only applies to those who give their own means, their own money. I do not think it applies to those who give other folks' money; and if the Senator really wishes to establish a credit of that kind, I think he had better confine his appropriations to his own pocket and relieve the national Treasury. It is the cheapest mode in the world to get up a character for philanthropy, to give away other people's money. It is very easy to say "yea" on the passage of this bill. I would rather do it as a mere matter of convenience than to give fifty cents out of my own pocket; but as a matter of propriety I think I had a little rather give fifty dollars—though that, to be sure, is a very large sum for me to contemplate—than to say "yea" on the passage of this bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am perfectly willing to make that arrangement with the Senator from Wisconsin. I will vote for the bill and he can give the fifty dollars. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. I guess those are about the best terms I can make with the Senator from Missouri, [laughter,] and I believe I shall accept the proposition. I will give the fifty dollars and let him vote for the bill and I will vote against it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it is a little singular that the opposition to this measure should present itself in the way that it has done. Our brothers on the other side of the Chamber who have opposed it have desired very much to favor it, except that they are troubled with constitutional objections; and our friends upon this side who are opposed to it are not troubled with constitutional objections, but are opposed to it because it is charity. Now, I agree for one, and as others have said, I should not have said a word only for the yeas and nays, which call upon everybody to explain, that we ought not to devote ourselves to charity; but every nation that professes to be civilized has always in cases of great public calamity, although local like this, exercised what gentlemen now style charity, exercised the political right of disbursing public money and public aid to relieve the suffering which those great public calamities have occasioned; and this Senate within two weeks last past has appropriated public property (which is just as sacred and just as much protected by the Constitution and just as much within the scope of the Constitution as public money) by a unanimous vote and with the hearty good will of everybody to this very object.

Now, it seems to me that these scruples of ours come in strange opposition to the sentiments with which we first set out. We know in despotic Governments—to be sure they have not any constitution—the head of the nation, as in the case of great inundations in France, which are familiar to most Senators, within ten years past has made large appropriations to relieve the people of particular districts that have been drowned out; and in Great Britain large appropriations have been made to relieve the people of the particular districts, in one case where a flood overwhelmed a section, in another where an explosion occurred. It remains for us Americans, then, to be tied up by some sentiment, either of constitutional objection or of charity, to find that it is not in the power of this great people to appropriate any part of its money for the great purpose of relieving a great calamity because it happens to be local.

It is true that all things of this description must be watched with extreme care. We cannot go into a general system of insurance, it is true; but when an overwhelming calamity is visited upon any portion of the people of this country, brought upon them by no fault of theirs, I should be sorry indeed to have the American Congress say that it is not within the scope of its powers or within the scope of its wishes to deal out a small portion of public favor as we have already, and as I hope we shall now, to relieve the immediate pressure of such distresses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to postpone the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought the Senator from Pennsylvania withdrew that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not so understand the Senator. After the order for the yeas and nays the motion could not be withdrawn except by the unanimous consent of the Senate. The yeas and nays had been ordered on the motion. By unanimous consent the practice is to allow the mover at that stage to withdraw his motion, but not otherwise.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The withdrawal, I think, was before the ordering of the yeas and nays. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] was speaking, and he appealed to the Senator by his side [Mr. BUCKALEW] to withdraw the motion to postpone, and then made a motion himself.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Pennsylvania said he would withdraw that I might make a motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary, which motion I then made as a substitute for his motion.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I expressed a willingness to withdraw the motion to postpone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understood the Senator from Pennsylvania, but did not understand him as withdrawing the motion.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I expressed an entire willingness to withdraw the motion to postpone, in order that the other motion contemplated might be made. I have no right to withdraw the motion, I am aware, without the unanimous consent of the Senate. The yeas and nays were ordered prior to the conversation. If there is no objection, I will withdraw the motion in order to enable the Senator from Indiana to submit his.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks leave to withdraw the motion to postpone. Is there any objection? No objection being made, the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then, sir, I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Creswell, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howe, Kirkwood, Nesmith, Poland, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, and Trumbull—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Edmunds, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cowan, Cragin, Dixon, Fessenden, Howard, Lane, McDougall, Williams, and Wright—9.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I shall not renew the motion which I made before, because I presume the result would be the same as that on the motion made by the Senator from Indiana. I will not occupy the Senate, therefore, on that question. I will content myself with voting against the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. I just want to say, in explanation of my vote, that I do not see what is the force of the point made by the honorable Senator from Indiana as between this proposed appropriation and that made for the support of indigent persons in the South. The one was the result of war; the other is the result of accident, liable to occur every hour, while the former can, in all probability, never repeat itself, at least we all trust not. I find that difference. But while I think my heart is as warm and as ready to appropriate or give to the extent of my means as that of others, I cannot see how this appropriation can be made for this purpose and any denied that shall be asked hereafter in behalf of either a single citizen who has lost his all, or a number of citizens who shall be equally calamitous with those of Portland.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 22, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Edmunds, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Conness, Creswell, Davis, Doolittle, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Kirkwood, Nesmith, Poland, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, and Williams—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cowan, Cragin, Dixon, Fessenden, Howard, Lane, McDougall, and Wright—8.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 191) for the relief of certain officers of the Army, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN A. BINGHAM of Ohio, Mr. GILMAN MARSTON of New Hampshire, and Mr. NELSON TAYLOR of New York, managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 692) increasing the pensions of widows and orphans, and for other purposes, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SYDNEY PERHAM of Maine, Mr. PHILETUS SAWYER of Wisconsin, and Mr. MICHAEL C. KERR of Indiana, managers at the conference on its part.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives has passed, without amendment, the following Senate bills:

A bill (S. No. 137) to amend the acts approved August 6, 1861, and July 16, 1862, establishing a Metropolitan police in the District of Columbia, to increase the efficiency thereof, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. No. 346) relating to public schools in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 125) authorizing the construction of a jail in and for the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 230) to amend an act to extend the charter of the Alexandria and Washington railroad, passed March 3, 1863; and

A bill (H. R. No. 780) to protect the revenue, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a resolution to close the present session of Congress by an adjournment of the two Houses on the 25th day of July, at twelve o'clock meridian.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (H. R. No. 50) to amend the fifth section of an act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, so as to extend the time within which the provisions of said act shall be accepted and such colleges established;

A bill (H. R. No. 334) to fix the number of judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to change certain judicial circuits;

A bill (H. R. No. 448) to authorize the construction of a railroad through certain land of the United States in Kansas;

A bill (H. R. No. 466) erecting the Territory of Montana into a surveying district, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 518) for the relief of the owners of the bark Maria Henry;

A bill (H. R. No. 555) for the relief of the owners of the Hawaiian bark Kamahamaha V;

A bill (H. R. No. 557) to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of Benicia and the town of Santa Cruz, in the State of California;

A bill (H. R. No. 695) for the relief of William H. Wheeler, of Bangor, Maine;

A bill (H. R. No. 727) to regulate the registering of vessels; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 119) for the relief of Isaac Ranney, internal revenue collector for the eighth district of Ohio.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the resolution of the House for the appointment of a joint committee on retrenchment, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and that they thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 50) to amend the fifth section of an act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, so as to extend the time within which the provisions of said act shall be accepted and such colleges established;

A bill (H. R. No. 213) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867;

A bill (H. R. No. 334) to fix the number of judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to change certain judicial circuits;

A bill (H. R. No. 354) for the relief of Edward P. McKinney, of Binghamton, New York, late captain and assistant commissary of subsistence;

A bill (H. R. No. 421) for the relief of James G. Holland, late acting assistant paymaster United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 448) to authorize the construction of a railroad through certain land of the United States in Kansas;

A bill (H. R. No. 466) erecting the Territory of Montana into a surveying district, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 517) for the relief of Liston H. Pearce;

A bill (H. R. No. 518) for the relief of the owners of the bark Maria Henry;

A bill (H. R. No. 521) for the benefit of Henry Horne;

A bill (H. R. No. 526) for the relief of the heirs of Horace I. Hodges;

A bill (H. R. No. 555) for the relief of the owners of the Hawaiian bark Kamahamaha V;

A bill (H. R. No. 557) to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of Benicia and the town of Santa Cruz, in the State of California;

A bill (H. R. No. 629) for the benefit of William G. Lee;

A bill (H. R. No. 695) for the relief of William H. Wheeler, of Bangor, Maine;

A bill (H. R. No. 727) to regulate the registering of vessels;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) for the relief of John Wells & Sons, of Baltimore;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 119) for the relief of Isaac Ranney, internal revenue collector for the eighth district of Ohio; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 170) for the relief of Caroline A. Randall, administratrix and widow of Charles B. Randall, deceased.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government, according to the notice I gave yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting the question on that motion, the Chair desires to present a large quantity of business from the other House for disposition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 124) authorizing the construction of a jail in and for the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (H. R. No. 230) to amend an act to extend the charter of the Alexandria and Washington railroad, passed March 3, 1863—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (H. R. No. 780) to protect the revenue, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Finance.

PAY OF ARMY OFFICERS.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 101) for the relief of certain officers of the Army, which were disagreed to by the House of Representatives and on which the House requested a committee of conference.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the committee on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent.

WIDOWS' AND ORPHANS' PENSIONS.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 692) increasing the pensions of widows and orphans, and for other purposes, which were disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and on which the House requested a conference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the absence of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. LANE.] I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the conference on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent.

THE GRADE OF GENERAL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 3) to revive the grade of General in the United States Army. The amendment of the House was in line twenty of the Senate amendment to strike out before "Army" the words "line of the" and to insert the word "regular."

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate concur in that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON RETRENCHMENT.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate to the House concurrent resolution for the appointment of a joint committee on retrenchment.

The amendment of the House was to insert after the last word of the Senate amendments the following words:

And inquire into the accounts and statements in reference to the Government debt and the management thereof, and the mode of depositing and keeping of the public money and all accounts relating thereto.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no doubt that the Senate amendments cover that ground already, but to save time I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 25th day of July, at twelve o'clock meridian.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that that be laid on the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not propose to debate it, but I wish to ask whether it can be taken up at any time.

Several SENATORS. It can be.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I design to call it up shortly, as soon as I am satisfied as to when we can adjourn. I am not quite satisfied yet that that day can be safely fixed upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the resolution lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed, on the 18th instant the following acts:

An act (S. No. 114) for the relief of A. T. Spencer and Gurdon S. Hubbard;

An act (S. No. 222) further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes; and

An act (S. No. 369) to establish certain post roads.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State, in compliance with the requirements of the eighteenth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States," approved August 18, 1856; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] moves that the Senate postpone the present and all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 787.

Mr. WILSON. The unfinished business in order is the bill to equalize bounties. Now, the Senator from Maine proposes to lay that aside and take up an important appropriation bill. I do not wish to have a controversy about the priority of business, and especially a controversy with the Committee on Finance and the appropriation bills. In order that this bill, which has been twice in order and crowded out, may have a fair chance, I move that its consideration be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock, and made the special order for that time; and if that be done, I will agree to give way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Maine being now pending, another motion cannot be received until that is disposed of.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the Senator from Maine will withdraw his motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator can make his motion afterward just as well. After this bill is taken up I will give him a chance informally to make his motion, if he desires. I will not interpose or attempt to interpose in the way of that bill anything except a bill that we must pass, and which it is important ought to pass immediately, because it must go back to the House. There are two or three of these bills.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that and felt that; and if the Senator will just allow this motion to be made and then take his bill up, I shall be content.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I withdraw my motion for a moment, then, in order to accommodate the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to postpone the bill named by him, being House bill No. 602, until to-morrow, and make it the special order for one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to by a two-thirds vote.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 477) further to provide for the safety of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, to regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed, without amendment, the following Senate bills:

A bill (S. No. 178) to incorporate the Metropolitan Mining and Manufacturing Company;

A bill (S. No. 277) for the relief of William Cook; and

A bill (S. No. 325) to give certain powers to the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. RIDDLE. I ask leave of absence for my colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] during the remainder of the session.

Leave was granted.

FUNDING OF THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I now renew my motion to take up the civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of the Senator from Maine, I will informally submit a motion to take up Senate bill No. 300, the funding bill, with a view to have a vote upon it. It was considered yesterday, and will not excite any debate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If it does not excite debate I will not object. That is an important bill, and it ought to be acted upon.

Mr. SHERMAN. It ought to be passed now if it is to pass this session. It can be taken up informally by general consent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let the appropriation bill be laid aside informally if it is to be laid aside at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill before the Senate will be laid aside informally in order to entertain the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 300) to reduce the rate of interest on the national debt, and for funding the same.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the bill by adding the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts authorizing the Comptroller of the Currency or the Treasurer of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to designate any national banking association organized under the laws of the United States to become a depository of public money, be so limited and construed as to hereafter prohibit the designation of any such bank as such depository in the District of Columbia, or in any city in which there is established by law an office of the Treasury of the United States known as a sub-Treasury thereof.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator from Iowa will not press that amendment. The bill now contains nothing upon which there is any controversy, so far as I know, in either House. It contains important provisions in regard to our public debt which it is admitted must pass, or ought to pass. This amendment introduces a very difficult and controverted question. This question is pending now, and is probably under debate in the House of Representatives, as to whether the national banks may be used as Government depositories where we have places of deposit. The officers of the Treasury are opposed entirely to this provision, and a little reflection will convince Senators that it would be utterly impossible, with our system of internal revenue, to get along if we require all deposits of public money in these large cities to be made in one place. In the city of New York, for instance, this proposition would require all the deposits made by collectors of internal revenue to be placed in the sub-Treasury there. Under the banking law as it has been amended, no disbursing officer can deposit in a national bank. That is well enough; and that is the law, I believe, without the recent act that has been passed. But under the present law collectors of internal revenue can make deposits in certain designated depositories, which are selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, and which have to give security to an amount equal to the deposits. It has also been found to be very useful in negotiating loans to use national banks temporarily as temporary places of deposit.

Let me illustrate this proposition to the Senator from Iowa. Suppose that every collector had to deposit all the money he received daily in the sub-Treasury. The sub-Treasurer cannot take anything but United States notes. The collectors take checks, certificates of deposit, and all forms of business securities. Nine-tenths of the payments made in the city of New York are made by certified checks. The collector of internal revenue takes them and deposits them in the national depository his immediate neighborhood. If this amendment be adopted, no collector can take a certified check; he cannot take anything but United States notes, and he must carry those notes daily to the sub-Treasury and deposit them there. It is practically impossible to do that. The effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be simply to embarrass and perhaps defeat this bill, because it will meet with opposition. It is contrary to the policy adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury. The United States Treasurers do not desire to keep these accounts for collectors of internal revenue. I trust, therefore, that the Senator will abandon the amendment, or else that the Senate will vote it down. The bill as it now stands contains nothing about which there is any controversy, and it contains provisions which it is very important to pass.

Mr. GRIMES. I have not the slightest disposition to throw any obstacle in the way of the passage of the Senator's bill. So far as I understand it, if I do understand it, I am in favor of it; but I have offered this amendment because it is the only method that I could adopt by which I could get a vote upon such a proposition as this. I do not know how many months ago it was, but several months ago I offered a resolution instructing the Committee on Finance to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that in cities where there was a sub-Treasury the public money should be deposited with the sub-Treasurer, but I have not seen, thus far, that there has been any action taken upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. There can be no deposit now made by any disbursing officer except in the sub-Treasury. The only deposit that can be made in one of these depositories is by the Treasurer of the United States or the collectors of internal revenue.

Mr. GRIMES. That is so, not by the action of Congress, but by the action of the chief of a bureau or the chief of a Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; we passed a law on the subject.

Mr. GRIMES. When?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator probably was not present; but about a month ago we passed a law forbidding any disbursing officer to deposit money with a national bank—a law which contains substantially the idea that the Senator advocates. Collectors of internal revenue and the Treasurer of the United States are now the only persons who can deposit public money in these banks in cities where there are Government depositories. It is found to be very convenient to have this privilege continued so far as those officers are concerned. The bill to which I refer was passed and approved long since—at least a month ago.

Mr. GRIMES. Then why not proceed one step further and provide that money belonging to the United States, in New York city, instead of being deposited on the corner of Wall street and Broadway, in the First National Bank, as, I think I have learned, several millions not long ago were deposited, shall be deposited in the sub-Treasury, about one block further down Wall street? Is it any very great inconvenience to the collector to deposit there? Is it any inconvenience to the public? Will not the public regard themselves as a little safer in having the money deposited there in the sub-Treasury than in the bank? Does not the Senator know that the result of depositing in the banks is to cause that very inflation which the Secretary of the Treasury says he is attempting to curb and check in every way? These deposits when they are put in the banks are used for the purpose of making discounts upon, and expanding the volume of the currency; and yet the Secretary of the Treasury is constantly crying out that he is attempting to curtail the currency and to curtail this expansion, and he instructs the Senator from Ohio to come down here and say that he is opposed to enforcing the provisions of the old sub-Treasury law, which required all the public money to be deposited in the sub-Treasury. I do not know how many more explosions we shall have similar to that which occurred right under our eyes here in Washington; but I predict that they will be numerous if we do not put some restraint upon these deposits. I do not know, for I have not taken the trouble to investigate it—I did not know this bill was coming up, until yesterday, or I should have done so—but I am told that millions at a time have been deposited just across from the sub-Treasury in one of the national banks, the deposits of which were worth to the men who owned the bank four per cent., and who were willing to pay it, or other parties were willing to pay it for them. I think this thing out to be checked. I do not suppose that my amendment will be adopted, but I want to have a vote upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the existing law nobody can deposit public money in a national depository except a collector of the internal revenue and the Treasurer of the United States since the law has been changed; and that is really the provision of the banking law. Now, the question is whether we shall repeal entirely the power of collectors of internal revenue and the Treasurer of the United States to deposit.

Mr. GRIMES. This amendment only applies to the cities.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know, in the cities where they are deposited. Now, it is convenient to make these depositories in those cities for collectors of the internal revenue, and the Secretary of the Treasury finds it convenient in making loans; and I have no doubt that the deposit of which the Senator from Iowa spoke in this city was made in the course of negotiating a loan. That is the only way in which deposits come there; and it was convenient and necessary to make those transactions by depositing in national banks, or otherwise the Government would lose largely, these deposits coming in the form of checks, certificates, and drafts from various parts of the United States, which cannot be received by the Treasurer.

Now, in regard to the collectors, take the city of New York. There are five collection districts in that city, scattered all over the city. These collectors receive from the people certified checks, certificates of deposit, and various kinds of commercial instruments. I do not suppose that one dollar in a hundred is paid in actual currency. It is done by certified checks. To require the collectors daily to go down into Wall street, and deposit this money day by day with the sub-Treasurer of the United States would be a very inconvenient arrangement for the sub-Treasurer; they are all opposed to it; it would be a very inconvenient arrangement for the people, because the people would then be compelled to gather up United States notes, for nothing else would be received at the sub-Treasury, and it would be very inconvenient for the collectors. It would throw upon them additional responsibility and trouble. All these deposits now are secured by United States bonds, so that under the existing law there can be no trouble. In the case that occurred here of the Merchants' Bank, that occurred by a clear and palpable violation of the law, where a disbursing officer undertook in violation, not only of the law but of instructions, to deposit money in the Merchants' Bank. That is all repealed and modified.

This amendment, if it shall be adopted, will introduce into this bill, which contains but a few simple provisions, a controverted subject upon which there is a difference of opinion. A bill is now pending in the House of Representatives intended to further secure the United States in these deposits, and to limit and qualify the deposits, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to draw them down to a certain amount, so that they can never exceed the amount of security. It would be a great deal better to leave this difficult question to be settled in that way. We may not pass that measure at this session, but I suppose we shall do so at the next in some form. I trust, therefore, that this important bill will not be embarrassed by a question entirely foreign to it, relating to the national bank system, for it will very seriously embarrass the bill if it is placed upon it. I hope that the Senator and the Senate will allow the bill, which is admitted to contain good features, to pass without encumbering it.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before I vote on the amendment I wish to inquire of the Senator from Iowa in what respect it conflicts with the bill which was passed some time ago.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand from the Senator from Ohio that the bill that was passed some time ago prohibited disbursing officers from depositing money in the national banks. This would apply to the collectors of internal revenue as well.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This will leave any officer of the Government to make a deposit in a bank where there is no office of the Treasury?

Mr. GRIMES. Where there is no sub-Treasury they will still go on under the regulations now established; but in cities where there are sub-Treasuries and in the District of Columbia they will be required to deposit the money in the sub-Treasury or the Treasury. It leaves the law precisely as it now stands outside of cities where there are sub-Treasuries.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It does not disturb the present law where there is no sub-Treasury?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir; not at all.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Clark, Creswell, Davis, Edmunds, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, McDougall, Morrill, Norton, Poland, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Fessenden, Foster, Guthrie, Morgan, Pomeroy, Riddle, Sherman, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Cowan, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Howard, Nesmith, Nye, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, and Wright—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole; and the question will be taken on the amendments collectively unless a division be asked.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have a separate vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the use of that? It has just been adopted by a vote of two to one.

Mr. SHERMAN. Still I shall call for a separate vote upon it. I wish to do my duty at any rate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be excepted. The question is on concurring in the residue of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The other amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to submit to the Senate whether, as a business proposition, it is wise to adopt a provision of this kind, changing the existing law, without the examination of any committee; a proposition that has never received the sanction of any committee; a proposition that is opposed, so far as I know, by every officer connected with the Government of the United States; a proposition that will tie up the hands of the Government of the United States in negotiating loans, which will compel every collector to deposit every night in United States notes every dollar of money he receives into the sub-Treasury, which will require every collector in the city of New York to go into the neighborhood of the Park every night to deposit money with the sub-Treasurer, and then he must convert certified checks into United States notes, because money cannot be received in other form at the sub-Treasury. I ask whether it is wise at this stage of the session to encumber a bill of an important practical character with a provision not yet fully discussed and matured. If it is possible to apply the sub-Treasury system to the United States when we are collecting internal revenue, I do not believe any officer of the Government is ever so safe; but it has never been done, and it cannot be done as a practical measure. The sub-Treasury system is a wise and judicious one. If we were collecting only at the ports, and gold and silver were the money used, it would naturally go into the sub-Treasury; but when money is collected as it is now by the collectors of internal revenue, partly in national currency, partly in United States notes, partly in certified checks, partly in drafts, flowing in almost every form, I ask is it wise, without reflection, without any examination by a committee, to require the collectors of internal revenue under the sub-Treasury act to deposit every night in the sub-Treasury of the United States in the large cities, where the deposit can only be made in United States notes?

There is another consideration. We are negotiating loans every day. Those loans are mainly negotiated in the city of New York and in other large cities. Now, if this amendment passes the sub-Treasurer, under the law, cannot receive a draft from the city of St. Louis or the city of New York in payment of a loan because the law forbids it. He cannot receive the various kinds of commercial instruments that are used among the people to transmit money, because the law forbids it. The law says that nothing shall be paid into the United States sub-Treasury except United States notes or gold and silver coin. My friend, the Senator from Maine, who was Secretary of the Treasury, knows that when he attempted to negotiate loans under a different system he was constantly embarrassed. He found trouble and delay until eventually he was compelled, in the first instance, to use the national banks even in the cities where there were existing depositories, because the national banks could receive drafts; they could receive bank notes; they could receive certified checks and all the various forms of commercial instruments; and the same stringency was not required in depositing there that was required by the sub-Treasury act.

Now, I ask whether it is wise for the Senate to vote to encumber this bill with a proposition so important as this, making so vital a change in the laws and in the customs of the Government against the wishes of those who are charged with the execution of the law at this stage of the session? As a matter of course I have no feeling about it. If the Senate think it is wise to do so they can pass the amendment. I have done my duty in presenting these objections to it.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I understand the internal revenue is payable in national bank notes. If this amendment be adopted, it will devolve on the collectors to refuse to take them, or they will be under the burden of changing them to legal-tender notes before they can make their deposits. They are not bound to do that now; and I think we ought not to encumber this bill with anything that is to invite discussion or procrastinate it. I hope that the amendment will not be concurred in.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand that the objection of the Senator from Kentucky to this proposition is not on account of any of its demerits, but because he does not want any discussion on the subject; he does not want anything of that kind added to the bill. I do not propose to discuss it, but I wish to say a single word in reply to the Senator from Ohio. I do not profess to be a financier; it may be that all knowledge on questions of this kind is confined to a few men in this body or a few men out of it, but this is a question that has been before this body for the last six months. I introduced a resolution months ago calling on the Committee on Finance to investigate this whole subject and report to us, not alone in regard to the disbursing officers, but in regard to everybody else. If they thought it was improper for such a law as that to pass, why did they not make a report to us on the subject?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can answer that. I can state that in connection with this banking difficulty there was the difficulty of withdrawing or rather of redistributing the national banking currency. That was the principal question upon which there was great difficulty and great difference of opinion. I introduced a proposition here and sent it to the Committee on Finance; the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] also introduced a proposition, and they were all considered. Finally, my friend from West Virginia [Mr. VAN WINKLE] introduced a proposition covering these points; but we were not able to agree. In the mean time a bill had been maturing in the House, and it was deemed best to let the matter stand until that bill came to us, to see if some system could be adopted with a view to diversify the national banking currency, and also to limit, restrain, and regulate deposits.

Mr. GRIMES. According to the last report that I read, there were between forty-seven and forty-eight millions of the public money deposited in the different banks. Most of this money was in the great commercial centers, principally in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia. There is not much public money deposited in the country banks. This provision, if it be adopted, will not apply to them. It will only apply to those cities where there is a public United States sub-Treasury established by law; and I should like to know what the Senator from Ohio means when he speaks about one of these collectors being compelled to travel fifteen or twenty miles in order to make a deposit?

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say that. I said to the neighborhood of the Park; and the Senator will see that the collector cannot deposit anything in the sub-Treasury except United States notes, legal-tender notes. He cannot deposit national bank notes.

Mr. GRIMES. Then let the Senator amend his law. Let him authorize the sub-Treasury to receive national bank notes.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would be a very dangerous and very embarrassing thing.

Mr. GRIMES. I believe the Senator was the Senator who carried the banking law through this body, and I trust he did not induce us to adopt any banking system here by which the Government would be injured if it should receive the notes of those banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. The United States must pay its debts always with United States notes, legal-tender notes, when demanded, and has no right to deal with others.

Mr. GRIMES. As I was saying, the amounts deposited in the country banks are small. The Treasurer makes it a rule not to allow a balance of more than $60,000 to remain in their hands. The bulk of this large amount of money, $47,000,000, is in the large cities. It is used there as the basis upon which the banks make discounts; and the purpose with which the banks seek to hold these deposits is to inflate the currency, to do the very thing which I understand it is the purpose of this Government to avoid so far as it may be practicable. I may be mistaken, but I should think we had had a warning by the occurrences of the last few months here in this city in this regard. I should think that when a bank, right under the eyes of the Treasury Department, explodes in the manner in which the National Merchants' Bank of Washington did, holding some half a million of the public money in its hands, from which I understand the Government will not realize one farthing, that should be a sufficient warning to us in regard to the proper methods in which we should dispose of the public deposits.

Some inquiry was made of me just before I rose to speak, as to what was the scope of this provision. It does not affect any banks except those within the corporate limits of the cities where there are sub-Treasuries. It is said that it will be some inconvenience to men to procure greenbacks with which to pay their taxes. I do not believe it. If it be, then I am in favor of withdrawing more of your national currency and issuing more of your greenbacks, if they are better than your national currency. That is the way to obviate that. I voted against your national banking system. I voted against every amendment to it. I believed that the true system was to issue your greenbacks. I did not believe there could be any better security than they. But now after you have gone on and created your national banks, when we propose to render the Treasury perfectly secure and safe by providing that the public money shall not be deposited with the national banks but shall be deposited with the sub-Treasuries, the argument is presented to us that we ought not to allow this national currency to be received in the discharge of public dues, and nothing except the national Treasury notes. Well, sir, I had not anything to do with bringing about that condition of affairs. It having been brought about, it seems to me that the safest and wisest way now is to begin to remedy the evils in which we find ourselves involved by restoring the old sub-Treasury system just so far as we can possibly do so.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Iowa I think must be aware that it is the law (and whether he voted for it or not does not make any difference) that persons paying their taxes may pay, and collectors receiving them are obliged under the law to take, the issues of the national banks. In the law creating the national banks we provided that the notes should be received for taxes and public dues. Having provided in the law that they shall be received, and the man who has a tax to pay having a right to pay it in national bank notes, where is the propriety in requiring the man who is obliged to receive them to deposit them where they will not take them? The amendment of the Senator from Iowa obliges the collector to deposit in a place where they will not receive and cannot under the law receive the issues of national banks; and yet the collectors are obliged to take them. It is certainly not only a manifest inconsistency, but a great hardship to oblige a collector to take the currency of the national banks and then oblige him to deposit it where it cannot be received. I think the amendment of the Senator is not only a great hardship but a great wrong.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I am not willing that, through the mistake of the Senator from Iowa, the Senate should misunderstand my position. I did not say that my only objection to this amendment was that it would lead to discussion. I said that one of the objections that I had to it was that it would necessarily lead to discussion and might defeat this bill, which I thought ought to pass. My principal objection was that it throws the burden upon the collectors to change the national bank notes into legal-tender notes by forcing them to be deposited, because the collectors are bound to take them by law for the internal revenue; and that is a burden which we have no right to throw upon the collectors, to make the change and go to these banks to redeem, when the law provides that they should be depositaries and intended that they should be in aid of the collectors of internal revenue. I believe I was the first man who required a strict enforcement of the sub-Treasury law, and in the short period of four years, I think, we manifested that it was the best system, and I still think so. It is likely, if I had been here at the time, I should have voted against these national banks. I think they are the weakest system in our paper currency now; but the object and intention of them no doubt was good.

Now, the gentleman objects that there was $47,000,000 in the different banks at the last report. Does not he and every financial man know that having to meet the great amount of the public debt and the interest and the appropriations, the Secretary of the Treasury must necessarily provide himself beforehand with the necessary money to meet them and maintain the credit of the Government? Does he not know that we must have a large amount of money to meet and control any combination of moneyed men against it? We know that when fifty or a hundred millions are to be paid, that fifty or a hundred millions must be provided for beforehand, and it must necessarily be in public depositaries of some kind or other.

Mr. JOHNSON. I voted for the amendment of the honorable member from Iowa, but it was under a misapprehension, as I find, of what the law is, which seems to me to affect the question. I understand now the law to be that a collector is obliged to receive, if tendered to him in payment of taxes, the national bank currency. The law of the sub-Treasury is that they are not to receive anything but legal-tender notes. In a city like New York, or any of the larger cities, the habit is universal of receiving indorsed checks as equivalent to the notes of the bank upon which the checks are drawn. It facilitates the transactions between man and man, and, of course, the transactions as between the tax-payer and the tax-collector. If you compel the tax-collector, as he is compelled by law, to receive the national bank currency, you throw upon him the duty, if you do not permit him to deposit it in the national banks, of converting that currency into legal-tender notes, and if he receives, as he is obliged to receive—I mean by “being obliged to receive” because he cannot well get on without it, without creating very great dissatisfaction and accomplishing no good—if he receives indorsed checks, you compel him not only to go to the bank upon which the checks are drawn, which the bank has the right to pay in national currency, but after he has received that currency for the amount of the checks, he is obliged to go into the market again and convert it into legal-tender notes.

Now, with my friend from Iowa, I see the danger—and that has been practically illustrated recently—of leaving these large amounts on deposit in the national banks; but then there are other things to be considered. As long as the national banks are in existence, and the sub-Treasury system is in existence, we must so legislate and so provide that each shall get on without unnecessarily embarrassing the public; and I do not see, as the whole subject is placed under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, who may limit the amount in the national banks, and in whom we ought to have confidence, in whom we must have confidence in relation to all matters of the currency, that there would be any very great danger in suffering those collectors to deposit in the national banks, instead of compelling them to deposit in the sub-Treasury, which would throw upon them the burden of converting what you compel them to receive into legal-tender notes. I shall, for these reasons, change the vote which I gave upon the proposition when it was in committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRIMES. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. I have only one word more to say in reply to what has been said by the Senator from Maryland. The great argument that he makes, and I believe that is substantially the argument made by the Senator from Kentucky, is that a great burden will be thrown upon the collector, inasmuch as the collector is now authorized to receive national bank notes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Compelled.

Mr. GRIMES. Compelled to receive national bank notes, and he cannot deposit them in the sub-Treasury. The whole argument, I believe, of the Senator was predicated upon the provision of the law which compelled the collector to receive national bank notes in discharge of the national taxes, but did not allow him to pay that kind of currency over to the sub-Treasurer. The law requires, as he tells us, the sub-Treasurer to receive, or justifies him in receiving, nothing but gold and silver and the greenbacks. Whose fault is that? If it is anybody's, it is our own. If the Committee on Finance desire to change that, they can very easily submit us an amendment to that effect. If they see what is the sentiment of the Senate on this subject, they can have this bill recommitted to them, and bring it back to us with a provision of that description. But if the sub-Treasury and the Treasury of the United States are to be administered in the interests of banks, of course such a provision as that will be permitted to remain upon the statute-book, and that will always furnish an admirable argument for never authorizing deposits of any other description and anywhere else except in the vaults of these pet banks.

Mr. President, I have confidence in the banking capacity of the Secretary of the Treasury; but he cannot foresee, in my opinion, the evils that are likely to result, and that will most inevitably result, in my opinion, whenever he succeeds in what he says he is attempting to do, to curtail the currency of the country and bring us back to specie payments. Then will come the time when these deposit banks will not be able to respond to the demands that will be made upon them; and I am disposed to have the record appear in such a shape that I shall not be put in the category of those who voted in favor of allowing the public treasure to remain in their hands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the banking system is one that we have deliberately adopted. If we propose to repeal it, now that it is in full operation, that is one thing. If we propose to let it stand awhile longer, that is another thing. A part of the contract that we have made with all these institutions is that their notes shall be receivable for all public dues except customs. It is so printed on the back of the notes; and it was a part of the argument in favor of that banking system that it would furnish a currency which might be so receivable and relieve the community with regard to the collection of taxes. The two systems are connected together; and authority was given at the same time, and must necessarily be given, unless you change your sub-Treasury law, if that system went into operation, that those banks might become deposit banks. Now, sir, there are deposit banks all over the country. The honorable Senator from Iowa does not propose to change the law, because he cannot do it, with regard to the banks in his own State or my State or in most of the places over the country; but with regard to a few cities where there are sub-Treasuries, he says you must change the law because there is a sub-Treasury there. I am inclined to think it has some reference rather to the concentration of capital than anything else.

Now, sir, the question is perfectly simple; it is one that everybody can understand. The banking law stands at present. We have neither the time nor ability at this session to abolish the system or to change it substantially. These bills that are paid out must be receivable for all public dues except customs, and they so receivable; what is the result? Take the city of New York, for instance, the great point to which the Senator alludes; and what must a collector do? The people come to him and pay their taxes in these bank notes. He must take them. The law requires him to take them. He cannot deposit them in the sub-Treasury, because the sub-Treasury is not authorized to receive them. It can receive nothing but lawful money, and that is coin and United States notes. What is the result? Every collector becomes a broker, or must employ a broker to change his money for him; and one result, I fear, in the scarcity of these United States notes, comparatively, scattered as they are all over the country, is that it will make them at a premium and these officers will have to buy them in order to deposit them. That will be the result. You see it is attended with great inconvenience. You compel the collector every day to receive money which he cannot deposit, and to become an exchanger of money in order to get something he can deposit.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator be kind enough to answer me one question?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly, if I can.

Mr. GRIMES. Why is it that we authorize and direct the collector to receive national bank notes, and yet refuse to receive them from him at the sub-Treasury?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because the original sub-Treasury law has not been changed.

Mr. GRIMES. Why has it never been changed?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because the genius and industry of the Senator never led him to propose it.

Mr. GRIMES. Or let me ask the Senator if it is not because we are administering the Government in the interest of banks, on the other hand, so as to prevent that kind of currency being paid over into the Treasury.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is a sensible man, and a fair man ordinarily, but he is very apt to appeal to little prejudices sometimes to carry a point; and this is one of them. Talk about administering the Government in the interest of banks! Who wants to do it? Do you suppose I want to do it? Nobody wants to do it. We administer the Government in the interests of the people of the United States, and desire to do it; but we have established a system, and that system has gone along here until we are in the very last days of the session. That is the amount of it. Now, if the Senator does not like it let him introduce a bill and see if it will pass, that the sub-Treasury shall receive anything and everything, and then this will be consistent; but as it is it cannot be done, unless you change the law entirely. If it is wise to repeal the law organizing these banks, that is one thing. If it is wise to say that we will break our contract and that the notes they put out, which declare on their backs that they are receivable for all public dues except customs, shall not be so received, that is another thing. If it is wise to say that the sub-Treasury, which is an entirely different system, shall receive everything that is offered in the shape of currency, that is another thing. But we are not in a condition to do that at this period of the session. Then the simple proposition is to compel a collector to take a certain kind of money, which he must take, and which makes the largest amount of the circulation now, and say he shall not deposit that money, but at his own risk and hazard he shall every night get something that he can deposit. I hold that that is not reasonable. It will make very great inconvenience and trouble in the large cities. If we are going to change the matter at all it should be radical, and not a mere step in advance which will increase the difficulty.

I will add that although there is always danger, you cannot devise a system that is not dangerous with regard to banks. There will be these failures and these difficulties probably in any system that may be devised. Up to this period there has been much less of difficulty in this system than I anticipated, because it never was a favorite system of mine. I hate to say "when I was in Amsterdam" or anywhere else; but when I was Secretary of the Treasury I saw to it that these large balances were drawn down just as fast as they accumulated, and gave positive orders to that effect, which were carried into execution with very considerable rapidity, much more so than could be used now, because there was more occasion for the use of money. I have no doubt the present Secretary of the Treasury follows the same rule, and the present Treasurer of the United States, who operates that, is a very careful, prudent man, and I have no doubt that he does it in the same way.

Mr. HENDERSON. I voted in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa before; but I shall be compelled now, upon the discussion of the matter to vote against it; and in doing so, I vote against my very best convictions, and simply in consequence of the previous legislation, which cannot now be altered.

Mr. GRIMES. Why not?

Mr. HENDERSON. Because we have not the time to do it. The amendment of the Senator is correct, provided it were supported by legislation. There can be no question of that. The difficulty is in having two qualities of United States paper to be thrown into the sub-Treasury. I do not say that I would make this paper receivable into the sub-Treasuries, but it certainly is a just and correct proposition in itself, that no public money shall be deposited in banks when you are within range of a sub-Treasury; because long experience, in fact the entire experience of the Government, has demonstrated that whenever we resort to banks to make our deposits, we lose money. The deposits of this Government are now again becoming very large. They are becoming as they were in 1836.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill will reduce them.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am told by the Senator from Ohio that this bill will reduce them. I am gratified to hear it. I have not been able to give the attention to this bill that I desired to do; but, sir, anything ought to be resorted to that is honest and just and fair to reduce these immense deposits now in the banks of the country. If they be continued I am very well satisfied as to what will be the result. You had an illustration of it in Washington city a short time ago; and you will find that the bank that exploded in this city is not the only one that will explode. You will find that the Government will lose money, as it did in 1836, and then, as in 1837, when the Government has lost immense sums of money, we shall go back by a revulsion, as it were, and adopt the sub-Treasury system and require that Government money shall be collected either in coin or in Treasury notes and deposited only in the sub-Treasuries. I believe that the day is fast coming when we shall have to adopt that system again. I have ever been in favor of the sub-Treasury system, and I am opposed to making deposits of the public money in the banks of the country. I do not know why it is that these very large deposits have been made. I have not given sufficient attention to the subject to know why the Secretary of the Treasury has been unable to use these large deposits in the payment or reduction of the public debt. I cannot tell why we have from fifty to one hundred millions in the banks of the country when we owe some three thousand millions, and a part of it is constantly maturing on our hands. I merely throw out these things to show why I shall be constrained, as it were, to cast the vote that I shall give.

Mr. DAVIS. I voted for the amendment of the honorable Senator from Iowa in the first instance, and I shall vote for it again, because I believe it to be right. I think one of the greatest evils of the day is a redundant, spurious currency; and I think one of the greatest desiderata of the people is to have a reduction of this currency, that it may appreciate by the reduction and under the influence and operation of the reduction. The Senator from Iowa has told us, as we remember from the report of the deposits, that there are some forty or fifty millions of the public money deposited in these national banks, and they form the basis of an expansion of the currency of those national banks proportionably. Any measure that will cut off the deposits of the Government in the banks from being the basis of an increased circulation I will vote for; and I believe the effect, or one of the effects, of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa would be to prevent these deposits from being the basis of circulation issued by those banks.

But it is objected that the collectors are to receive a currency, to wit, the notes of the national banks, which they cannot deposit with the sub-Treasury. That might be remedied in two lines. If gentlemen desire that the sub-Treasuries shall be compelled to receive the notes of the banks in payment of Government dues, let them provide, by a little amendment, that that shall be the fact; that the notes of any of the national banks shall be received by the collectors in payment of taxes, and when he goes to make his deposits to the sub-Treasury, that the sub-Treasury shall receive those same notes on deposit. It would be the simplest thing in the world for such an amendment or addition to the law to be made, and I think it ought to be made.

My knowledge of banking is so inconsiderable that my opinion is of no value on the subject; but I never had any faith or confidence in this national system of banking, and I have not yet. The events that have taken place have not been of a character to increase my confidence. My distrust in this system of banking has rather increased than diminished. But without regard to the merits of the system, I think that every step and every act of legislation which Congress can adopt that would restrict the amount of the issues of paper currency ought to be adopted. I believe that if these deposits of forty or fifty millions that have gone into the banks, were required by law to be deposited in the sub-Treasuries where they could not be the basis of an expansion of the paper currency, the effect would be to some considerable degree to restrict the issue of paper by the banks; and with that belief of the operation of the amendment, I am in favor of it, and shall vote for it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I offer this amendment to the proposition of the Senator from Iowa:

And all officers of the Treasury are authorized and required to receive on deposit from all revenue officers any currency that is receivable according to law upon taxes and public dues.

If it had been possible to stand by the sub-Treasury system of the United States as established a number of years ago, I would be the last man perhaps in this body to consent to a proposition of this kind. But laws have been enacted authorizing the receipt of the national bank currency in payment of the taxes and dues to the General Government. Now, while this shall be received upon the taxes of the country, I cannot conceive why it shall not be received in the Treasury upon deposit; and therefore I offer the amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I hope that the amendment to the amendment will not be adopted. The national bank notes are receivable in payment of the internal taxes and all public dues except on imported goods, and they are bound to redeem those notes in coin or legal currency. It was the intention, as I understand, of those who made the national banks, through them, to prepare the country for a return to specie payments. It is in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, as this money is deposited in the local depositories, to return it to the banks for legal-tender notes or specie. After returning all that is received, he will get the legal-tender notes. Under the scheme of the gentleman from Iowa, he throws the burden of returning or exchanging upon the collectors. It is within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to have them returned.

I have great confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury; I believe that he intends to do right. I believe that he is honest in his purposes. I know that he must have a considerable amount of money at his command in advance in order to meet the public dues. I know that sometimes it is convenient, when payments are to be made in the West, to have money in the West to draw upon; and when payments are to be made in the North to have money in the North to draw upon. We used to keep money in New York; we used to keep it at St. Louis; and we kept it at Boston, and in all places where there were national sub-Treasuries, and we kept it in the custom-houses and in the land offices; and thus, where it was convenient to a party to receive his money, we were able to draw for it at that place.

It was the intention, through the national bank system, which is no favorite of mine, to reduce the currency and to bring their notes to the standard of legal tenders or specie as quickly as possible, and through their aid and assistance. It is capable of being so used now, and in six or eight months we should have, under the proper organization of that Department, a currency nearly equal to gold. It would not be my policy to redeem any portion of the greenbacks or legal-tender notes, as they are termed, except the compound-interest notes, while they could be obtained by exchanging the national bank notes for them. I think it is proper to consider the agency that was intended and that these banks are capable of affording in bringing us back to a sound currency with a reduced paper circulation.

I am as much opposed to lending the public money to public depositories as anybody else. I think it ought not to be lent or put out and allowed to stay where it can be banked upon. These bankers seek their own interest, and they induce men who have large sums of money to disburse for the Government to deposit with them by offering interest for the sake of making the difference. That is another great evil which we have remedied by legislation, for we have prohibited disbursing officers from so depositing the public money. I think that hastily, upon an amendment of this kind, we ought not to agree to the radical change that is proposed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am exceedingly reluctant to differ with the Senator from Kentucky, for whose opinion I have so much respect; but I do not understand, if it be proper to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, why it is not proper to adopt the amendment which I propose to his amendment. I understand the difficulty to be just this: the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will require the deposit in the offices of the Treasury of the bills of the national banks, and existing laws do not authorize that. I understand that to be the practical trouble with this proposition. Now, if it be right to receive the bills of the national banks upon Government dues and taxes, why is it not right to pay those bills into the Treasury? That is what I cannot understand. Why are those bills to be left in the hands of a collector or in the hands of a bank? If it is right to collect them at all they ought to be paid into the Treasury. I never dreamed until this morning but what they were payable into the Treasury. I supposed they were deposited in the Treasury like any other currency receivable upon the Government taxes. I understand that it is claimed by the advocates of the banking system that the currency is well secured, but depositors are not secured. Now, the proposition of the Senator from Iowa is to put an end to the system of making deposits by Government officers as far as we can in banks. I think that is desirable. At the same time it is necessary to adopt this proposition, if we adopt his.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa; and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Creswell, Davis, Edmunds, Grimes, Hendricks, Lane, McDougall, Norton, Ramsey, Trumbull, Wilson, and Yates—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Fessenden, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Kirkwood, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Clark, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Howard, Howe, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Eiddle, Saulsbury, Wade, and Wright—13.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time and passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the title of the bill so as to make it read, "A bill for the payment of the public debt." It all relates to the public debt.

The motion was agreed to.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. No. 123) in relation to the settlement of the accounts of William P. Wingate, collector at the port of Bangor, Maine, reported from the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The civil appropriation bill, which was laid aside informally by common consent to take up the bill of the Senator from Ohio, is now before the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I must go on with that now.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Well, sir, I give way to you.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill laid aside informally will now be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 787) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In order to save time, I suggest that the amendments reported by the Committee on Finance be acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill, so as to avoid the necessity of two readings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken if there be no objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section one, after line ten, to strike out the following clause:

For facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electrical telegraph, $40,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Perhaps I ought to explain why the committee struck that out. Under a law which we passed in regard to a telegraph company to the Pacific, we by a sort of contract declared that we would appropriate $40,000 for ten years for this service, and this is one of the annual appropriations to meet it; but it was said on very good authority that that company had in fact broken its contract, and broken it habitually. The provision in that bill was that they should not charge over three dollars for a communication of ten words, I think, to California, and I am told that since its consolidation with the other telegraph companies of the country they charge enormously. On a communication to California over the line they charge some five dollars in addition, I believe, so as to make it eight dollars in fact for a communication across the continent. We thought that was an entire evasion of the law upon the subject, and that it was best to strike out this appropriation until the matter was either corrected or explained.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I should like to be informed by the chairman of the committee what his information is as to these charges.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I refer the Senator to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can refer my friend to his own colleague and the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] Perhaps they can tell the Senator as much or more about it than I can. I am informed, however, that the tax on a message to San Francisco is something like eight dollars. The Senator himself will probably know.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is there any limitation on them?

Mr. SHERMAN. In the charter, in the law which gives them this $40,000 annually, there is a limit of three dollars on a message from St. Jo. to San Francisco.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Sacramento.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps to Sacramento. We thought that charging this enormous amount on this end of the line was an evasion of the law.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I think from here to San Francisco makes the difference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As reference has been made to me, I will say that I know that the charge for telegraphing ten words from Washington to Portland, Oregon, is $10 50; and from Portland, Oregon, to Washington, it is $11 50 in gold, and the company decline to receive anything in payment for telegraphing from Oregon to Washington except gold. I know that this is an exorbitant charge. It has been represented that the company did not charge more than they were allowed to charge by the charter from the western boundary of Kansas to the Pacific ocean, but that the additional charges were made for the telegraph line between Washington and the western boundary of Kansas; but I have since heard on that point, upon which I do not profess to have any knowledge, that this company is consolidated with these other companies, and that in point of fact all these exorbitant charges go to this identical company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line seventeen, after the word "hundred" to insert the words "and fifty;" so that the clause will read:

For expenses in detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, as well as the coins of the United States, $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line sixteen, after the word "extension," to insert "grading and fencing the grounds, &c.;" so that the clause will read:

For completion of north wing of Treasury extension, grading and fencing grounds, &c., $300,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to amend that amendment by striking out "&c.," and by inserting the word "and" before "grading."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was in section one, after line fifty-seven, to insert the following clause:

For the preparation, printing, and publishing, at the Government Printing Office, of the report of the medical statistics in the Bureau of the Provost Marshal General, to be expended under the direction of Surgeon J. H. Baxter, $60,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to amend the amendment by striking out after the word "general" the words "to be expended" and inserting "to be prepared." The amendment of the committee takes the whole superintendence of the business of the office, so far as this work is concerned, away from the Superintendent of Public Printing, to whom it belongs, and gives it to this surgeon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have the precise language of the preceding clause.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; the preceding clause does not use the words, "to be expended under the direction," but "under the direction of the Surgeon General;" but I shall move, when the proper time comes, to alter that clause.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that I have any objection to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. There has been a great deal of difficulty from various officers who are intrusted with making reports interfering in the way in which they shall be published, as uninstructed men naturally make them of much more expense to the Government.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Who will settle the question as to the style of it?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Superintendent of Public Printing is the man to settle that question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As to the style of the report?

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course he would do it on consultation with the proper officer, but he is the only one who knows the way in which it should be done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will not object to the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is one other amendment that I will suggest to the Senator from Maine. The expenditure in the preceding clause of $60,000, and I suppose it is the same with regard to this amendment, is for the whole cost of the work.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This last is.

Mr. ANTHONY. And so is the first. As the clause was originally reported to the House of Representatives, the words "at the Government Printing Office" were not in, and the idea was to have this work printed in Philadelphia or outside somewhere; but the House very properly directed it to be done at the Government Printing Office, but did not alter the amount. I do not know that there will be any harm in voting that amount, but it will not require anything like that. The appropriation for the Printing Office comes under the general appropriation, and it requires no special appropriation except for the work which the Surgeon General will have to do, which, I suppose, a few thousand dollars will cover.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then that same reason would apply to the second clause appropriating $60,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should suppose that $10,000 would be enough there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We supposed this would cover the two.

Mr. ANTHONY. This covers the entire printing, in fact, of the Surgeon General's report. There is a typographical error in the clause. It speaks of the "first volumes of the Medical and Surgical History;" it should be the "first volume." The cost of the first volume we estimated at $50,000 when the resolution was before the Committee on Printing; but it is now made $60,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will make the amendment he proposed to the second clause, we can look at the other afterward.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I move to strike out, in lines sixty and sixty-one of the amendment, the words "to be expended" and to insert "the report to be prepared;" so that it will read:

For the preparation, printing, and publishing, at the Government Printing Office, of the report of the medical statistics in the Bureau of the Provost Marshal General, the report to be prepared under the direction of Surgeon J. H. Baxter, $60,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to have some explanation of this provision. It seems to me rather extraordinary. We have here, in the first place, a provision for expending $60,000 for the publication of a medical and surgical history of the rebellion by the Surgeon General. That I can understand very well. The propriety of it I can understand very well. Now, we have got a sort of counter-provision for expending an equal amount of money for publishing medical statistics, which I should think come under the same head, by a Surgeon Baxter, of whom I never heard—an entirely different affair, it seems. Now, is it important that we should have these two medical works? I merely ask for information. The proposition seems to me to be a novel one.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The second will undoubtedly be a very valuable work, as valuable as the first. They are not of the same character. The one consists of surgical operations and discoveries which have been made, which are considered of very great interest in the profession; the other is a collection of statistics of the health, age, height of the men, and everything kept in the Provost Marshal General's office from the beginning of the war, and is said by competent authority to be of very great value and interest. This surgeon, Mr. Baxter, has been the person who has been engaged in preparing it, and who has had the care and charge of it, and I suppose that he looks upon it as a matter of honor that he should be allowed to finish the work. He is a young man of ability, and a young man of great zeal, and has done this work himself in the office of the Provost Marshal General, where alone it ought to be done. He has been employed there for years in the preparation of this work, and has brought it almost to a state of completion.

Mr. HARRIS. Who has recommended it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was recommended by several gentlemen who were acquainted with him and knew the facts about the work. The result is, as I understand, that if this is not done, the same amount will be expended for doing it in another direction, and it was deemed to be but just to Surgeon Baxter that he should continue to have the supervision of the work until it was completed. That is the only question about it. The only question is, whether after having given the labor of three years, constant, unremitted, and able, to this work, it shall be taken from him and put into the hands of somebody else just at the time when it is brought to a conclusion.

Mr. HARRIS. I will inquire whether this has the approbation of the Surgeon General.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir, I think not; because the Surgeon General would like to take it into his own hands, and it was not deemed just or right that he should take it.

Mr. HARRIS. Has it the approbation of the Provost Marshal General?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that it has, and also of a number of gentlemen who understand the whole question well. It was brought to the attention of the committee, and they were unanimous in thinking it ought to be done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I happen to have some personal knowledge respecting this matter, and as the Senator from New York is desirous to know who Surgeon J. H. Baxter is, I will inform him that he is a Vermonter, if that is any objection to him. This young man is a surgeon of the highest reputation and ability in his profession. He came to this war as a surgeon, and from the beginning was attached to the Provost Marshal General's office, where he has labored, as the Senator from Maine has said, with the most distinguished ability and faithfulness, performing the duties relating to it, from the beginning to the end, as well as attending the hospitals here; and under the direction of the Provost Marshal General he has accumulated these statistics, by work night and day, in season and out of season, until he has systematized and put in the form of tables and statistics the physical history, for it amounts to that, of the whole recruiting service of the United States. Every man that was rejected or admitted in all the recruiting stations of the whole Union appears in his statements and tables; that is, the results of his physical examination, making, when it is finished, as it is almost finished, by far the most complete and elaborate and perfect work of the description, showing the physical strength and power of this nation, that ever was published or ever was got together in any nation of the world. Now, having almost accomplished this most valuable labor, it is proposed by some party or other to deprive him of the honor of it by closing his office and turning it over to the Surgeon General, under whose broad phylacteries it goes into the general account of the great deeds of the Surgeon General. I do not wish to detract from the Surgeon General. I do not know that he is personally aware of this performance.

As the Senator from Maine has said, this does not increase the expenditures. No money is to be expended for the benefit of Surgeon Baxter. He does not ask it; but he does ask, and his friends have a right to ask, and it is only just, that the honor which attaches to his labors shall belong to him, and not to the Surgeon General. The money must be expended, as it ought to be, for the public good; and the simple question is, as the Senator from Maine has said, whether Surgeon Baxter shall have the superintendence of completing these statistics, rather than be deprived of it after he has performed the labor? That is all there is in the question.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is very plain, I think, that these two publications are in some degree rival publications.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; they are of a different character entirely.

Mr. ANTHONY. I know that the idea of the Surgeon General was to print five volumes. This bill provides for the first volume, and one of the volumes was to contain tabular statements of the same nature as those that I suppose are provided for in the amendment of the committee. I have no doubt from what has been said that this Surgeon J. H. Baxter should have the charge of that portion of the work; but I think it is unnecessary and unadvisable to make two works.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to suggest that the Surgeon General has in his department no records or statistics whatever touching the subject of the physical examination of men for admission into the Army, which shows the strength of this nation. All that he has is records touching the diseases of the Army, men who have been admitted and who have become the victims of disease or of wounds. Therefore, the two species of statistics, so to speak, have no opposition to each other and no duplication of each other. The one relates to the physical condition of this whole nation, as shown by these examinations of men, both admitted and rejected; while the Surgeon General's office, from the very nature of the case, only has the records of the wounds and diseases of the soldiers actually in service; so that there is no incompatibility or hostility in the two matters whatever.

Mr. CONNESS. That is entirely true, as stated by the honorable Senator from Vermont; but I presume that the records belong to the Government, and that when the Government is about providing for a medical history of the rebellion, under the direction of the Surgeon General, we can if we see fit (and it appears to me it might be done with great propriety) transfer the data described by the Senator, which I know exist and come from another source, to the Surgeon General's office, so that the whole publication may be made together. There is no necessary inconsistency in doing that, because of the different sources from which the information comes. It occurred to me before the Senator from Rhode Island called attention to it that it looked very much like the character of a separate job to provide for this second publication. I happened to be one of a number invited to confer in 1864 in the War Department on the subject of the disabilities of men entering the military service or called upon to enter the military service, and understand very well the difference in the sources of the information as well as the difference in the class of information; but they are, nevertheless, statistics of the same kind and character; one simply going to the fitness or unfitness of men for the Army, and the other to wounds and disabilities received in the service.

Mr. ANTHONY. The proposition to publish a medical and surgical history of the rebellion was first brought before the Senate by a resolution which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It was then reported back from them with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Printing, and it was so referred. The proposition was to print the medical and surgical history of the war in five volumes; and it was to include—I certainly so understood—what is provided for in this amendment, for which $60,000 is to be appropriated. The Committee on Printing were at first all opposed to the publication on account of its great expense, involving an estimate of $250,000, and it would probably cost considerably more than that; but upon further examination, and upon looking at the museum of the Surgeon General, and looking at the records of his department, I believe we all came to the conclusion that it would be advisable to publish it.

This war has been remarkable in everything, and in nothing more than the development of surgical and medical science. There have been operations performed in the war that have been uniformly unsuccessful heretofore. There have been six successful operations of amputations at the hip joint, and I believe medical history shows but two previous successful operations. Out of thirty-one attempts in the Army, six were successful. I suppose this information that the Government has belongs to the world, and that in the interests of humanity and civilization we have no right to suppress it; but I want the Senate to understand what is going to be the cost of printing it. It will not cost less than $300,000. I am in favor of going on with the work. I think it is due to science; I think it is due to the world; and I think it reflects the highest credit upon our medical service; but I think it ought to be put into one work. I think that this portion for which an appropriation is made in the amendment, should be under the direction of Surgeon H. Baxter after the statement which has been made; but I think it ought all to be put together in one publication.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There will be no difficulty about that; they can arrange that between them.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am afraid that they cannot arrange it between them. It looks to me as if there was hostility between the Surgeon General and this surgeon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This will give each man the credit that is due to him.

Mr. ANTHONY. But if each man is to print his portion under his own direction—

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are only to prepare it. We put it all under the direction of the Superintendent of Public Printing, and that matter will be arranged by him.

Mr. ANTHONY. If they have their own way, they will have two volumes just as different as they can make them with type and paper, no doubt.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it would be well enough to adopt the idea of the Senator from Rhode Island and require that this should be printed in connection with the report of the Surgeon General—printed in the same style and bound in the same manner as the report of the Surgeon General.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My impression is that it is not necessary to do that. I think we cannot settle that here. One is necessarily a very expensive work; it consists in a very great degree of plates, photographs, and things of that sort. A part of the Surgeon General's report cannot be done at the Printing Office; that will have to be done under the direction of the Surgeon General himself. That which will have to be done elsewhere involves a very large portion of the expenses. Like all anatomical and medical works, showing bones, diseases, &c., it must be full of illustrations from plates; and at the Surgeon General's office they have been finding artists among the soldiers themselves and preparing that matter, and it must necessarily involve great expense. I do not believe that $300,000 will meet the whole expense of it. This, on the contrary, is a collection of facts and tables. It is not more expensive than other printing. I do not believe it will require the style of printing that the other report, that of the Surgeon General, does. It is, as the honorable Senator from Vermont has stated, a collection of facts showing the physical power of the country from the description of the men. I have seen some of these tables; they are very interesting and got up with a great deal of skill.

It must be some time before these publications will begin to any considerable extent, and at the next session of Congress, if it is thought proper to connect the two works together, it can be done; but I apprehend that we should make a mistake now in declaring that this work of Dr. Baxter shall be done in the same style with that of the Surgeon General. They are works of an entirely different and distinct character. The Committee on Finance thought that under the circumstances it was a mere matter of justice to this young man, who is a very able young man, and a very excellent young man, and has devoted his days and his nights to this work, that just on the eve of completing his labors it should not be taken out of his hands and go to swell the already high and exalted reputation of others, to whom, perhaps, reputation is not of so much consequence as it is to him. Under these circumstances the Finance Committee unanimously came to the conclusion that this appropriation ought to be made in this way. I think it is a just conclusion, and I hope the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the work is all completed, why do you want an appropriation of $60,000?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know whether it will all be needed or not. That we shall inquire about before it gets through. Let the amendment stand as it is now, and of course nothing will be expended that is not necessary; it is under the direction of the Superintendent of Public Printing.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert after line sixty-eight of section one the following clause:

For repairs of the custom-house and post office and the walks and fences adjoining the same, at Middletown, Connecticut, $5,000, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a transfer from the end of the bill where the item is improperly placed. The committee were satisfied that it was advisable to make the expenditure.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was to strike out the following item, from line two hundred and forty-four to line two hundred and fifty, of section one:

For compensation to the Commissioner and chief clerk of the General Land Office (to be apportioned by the Secretary of the Interior) in consideration of the increased duties devolving on them from June 7, 1865, to December 31, 1865, in connection with the census of 1860, $1,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following item, from line two hundred and seventy-two to line two hundred and seventy-five, of section one:

To enable the Commissioner of Public Buildings to employ a suitable electrician to take care of and operate the lighting apparatus of the dome of the Capitol, at a salary of $1,500 per annum, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line two hundred and seventy-five of section one, "for pavement in part in front of the War and Navy Departments to be replaced with stone flagging, $13,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line three hundred and seventy-four of section one, "for watchman for Franklin square, $600."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following clause after the item just adopted:

For the compensation of eight extra clerks in the office of Indian Affairs, under the acts of August 5, 1854, March 3, 1855, and March 3, 1855, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, $11,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the previous item "for the continuation of the work upon the north portico of the Patent Office building, $50,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following clause after the one just adopted:

For additional contingent expenses of the Northeast Executive Building, or the building occupied by the Secretary of State, including extra watchmen and laborers, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the item just adopted the following:

For salaries of commissioners under an act to provide for the revision and consolidation of the statute laws of the United States, approved June 27, 1866, and for clerical services, and other incidental expenses, the printing to be done by the Government Printing Office, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following item after the clause just adopted:

To enable the superintendent of Indian affairs for California to collect information and testimony in regard to the claim of George McDougal for beef furnished Indians in the lower part of California in the year 1852, $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the item just adopted the following:

For the purchase of a site, and the erection of a building at St. Paul, Minnesota, for a custom-house, post office, the accommodation of the Federal courts, and other necessary Government purposes, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the previous item the following:

For the payment of temporary clerks of the first class in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the previous item the following:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior, at his discretion, to rent such rooms in the vicinity of the Department for the use of the Pension Office as may be deemed necessary for the transaction of the business of that office, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line four hundred and eighty-three to line four hundred and ninety-six of section one, in these words:

Providence hospital, District of Columbia:
For the purpose of aiding in the erection of an additional building to the Providence hospital, in the city of Washington, $30,000: Provided, That if the said property should ever be sold or diverted from the uses expressed in the act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate Providence hospital, of the city of Washington, District of Columbia," approved April 8, 1864, then the sum of $30,000 shall be first paid out of the proceeds thereof into the United States Treasury to reimburse the sum hereby appropriated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Finance recommended the striking out of that clause, for the reason that there was no plan before them and they did not know that one had been drawn, and they had no estimates and no proper information to guide them in regard to it. The provision seemed to be very loosely drawn. Since then the members of the committee have looked into it, and they have come to the conclusion that it may be as well to retain the clause, on the information they get, with this proviso inserted after the word "dollars," in line four hundred and eighty-six:

Provided, That no portion of said sum shall be so expended until the plan of said building is submitted to the architect of the Capitol extension, and he shall certify that it is well adapted to the purpose contemplated, and that its cost will exceed $60,000; and the said sum of $30,000 shall only be paid in installments as an equal amount derived from other sources shall be expended in said building. And the said building is hereby dedicated to the relief of sick and indigent persons without distinction as to creed or color, and shall remain under the care of the Sisters of Charity as incorporated under the act entitled "An act to incorporate Providence hospital in the city of Washington, District of Columbia," approved April 8, 1864.

Mr. MORRILL. Not this precise provision, but an application was brought before the Committee on the District of Columbia for a similar provision in favor of another institution of this kind chartered at the present session. The act was approved on the 1st of June, incorporating a hospital of a similar character; I do not remember its name. The question which was presented to the committee is this: these private corporations come here and ask simply for a charter; they call it a private corporation; it is a private charity; they desire to be associated for the purpose of holding real estate and transmitting the same; they do not ask to be endowed; and there was no expectation on the part of the Committee of the District of Columbia when either of these acts of incorporation was granted that they would expect to be endowed by the Government. It seemed to be an indifferent affair that the Sisters of Charity should be granted corporate powers to enable them more successfully, as was supposed, with greater facilities to accomplish the object proposed, which was in part a public object of course, but so far as they were concerned it was a private affair.

Now, I do not rise so much to oppose this amendment or to advocate it as to state the general facts. The Committee on the District of Columbia having this application from another institution and finding that the Committee on Finance or the Committee of Ways and Means of the House had seen fit to make an appropriation to this institution, and thereby to that extent establishing the principle that we would endow these private corporations here, instructed me to offer an amendment to this bill endowing the institution which we incorporated this year, and which I propose to do according to the instructions, provided it is the sense of the Senate that these institutions are proper subjects for endowment on the part of the Government of the United States.

I ought to say, perhaps, that on examination the Committee on the District of Columbia came to the conclusion that this was not the duty of the Government in any sense, that these corporations were not in a situation to ask to be endowed. This Providence hospital was incorporated in 1864. The incorporators were highly respectable persons, females resident here in the city of Washington, and the object is highly commendable undoubtedly, and it has commended itself to the private charity of the city. The other corporation to which I allude, incorporated at this session, so recently as last month, is conducted by gentlemen of the highest respectability; it is in the hands of gentlemen of very great skill, and I have no doubt it will be of very great public interest.

But the question after all is, whether the Congress of the United States hold that this class of institutions are the proper subjects for endowment out of the Treasury of the United States. That is the question to be settled by the Senate. If that is to be so, then of course we ought to be a little more careful how we grant these charters. We have been in the habit, when application has been made by respectable persons who desire to be associated for the better facility of dispensing charities, to say that there is no harm in their having a charter; and we have not been in the habit of supposing that we incurred any responsibility or any liability by giving such a charter; but we are advised now that they are our adopted children, and that by the act of incorporation we do incur a responsibility and that an implication arises that they are to be endowed.

Now, sir, I do not rise to oppose the amendment of the committee, nor do I rise to advocate it. I only desire to call the attention of the Senate to the general subject; and if the Committee on Finance and the Senate feel that this is a proper subject of endowment out of the United States Treasury, then I shall not object, but shall only endeavor to follow it by such other legislation as will put all these institutions upon an equality.

I ought to observe, I think, in this place, that I am afraid there has not been quite as much care in referring this question to the appropriate committees for examination as there ought to have been. I think it is quite impossible that a Committee on Appropriations could have the specific information to enable them to act intelligently in all the cases of the institutions that are somewhat kindred and entitled to the bounty of the Government situated in the District of Columbia; and I think all the appropriations asked for ought to be referred to the appropriate committees for special examination. I believe they have been to some extent hitherto, but at the present session I think not. It will be found that the appropriations for charitable institutions in the District of Columbia are very large. The Congress of the United States supports to a very great extent all the public charities in this city; in addition to that, it pays the expenses of the entire administration of justice of the two cities and of the whole District, jails, penitentiaries, &c. It is for the Senate to say how far they will go in this direction.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The difficulty, if there is any, about these matters, arises from the fact that these bills come to us at the very last moments of the session, necessarily precluding us from the possibility of making the examination of them which we should be very glad to make, and we therefore have to rely on the previous examination made by the Committee of Ways and Means. Where the items are according to the estimates, we can look at them and see if they are the amounts estimated for by the several Departments. If they are estimated by the several Departments, and we find everything correct apparently, and the Committee on Ways and Means, who have had the getting up of the bill, recommend them, it is not in our power to go over and make a reexamination. They send us the papers which they examined; but there is no time to go through them all. The difficulty arises from the fact that this bill is put off to the end of the session. It is a sort of omnibus bill; it gathers up all the ends and odds, and necessarily passes, and I am afraid sometimes with material defects in it.

In regard to this hospital, we find the appropriation for it here in the bill. It comes from the Committee of Ways and Means of the House. This proviso is a very peculiar one: "that if the said property should ever be sold or diverted from the uses expressed in the act of Congress entitled 'An act to incorporate Providence hospital, of the city of Washington, District of Columbia,' approved April 8, 1864, then the sum of $30,000 shall be first paid out of the proceeds thereof into the United States Treasury, to reimburse the sum hereby appropriated." We examined the act of incorporation to see what those "uses" were, and there were no "uses" at all; it was simply an act incorporating certain persons as trustees of Providence hospital. That was all there was of it. We had no plans; we had no estimates; there seemed to be no conditions; we did not know what Providence hospital was to cost, or anything about it, and could not tell. Our conclusion, therefore, was—and perhaps it is the wisest conclusion, and one the Senate will adopt now; it is for them to say—that we should strike out the clause, and at any rate wait until the next session and see what ought to be done. After that conclusion of ours, the principals of the Sisters of Charity came, and when the objection was stated to them they said they had already marked out the ground, they had their plans, they had begun to build, and the building would cost $60,000. There was a little peculiarity in the statement that I am afraid I cannot exactly state; but the idea was that the building proper was to cost $45,000, and the additional $15,000 was for something else, I do not know what exactly, connected with it, so that in reality we were to pay two thirds, as I understood, of the actual cost of the building. These ladies applied to a majority of the committee, out of the committee-room, and they concluded to let it go, by putting in the proviso which I have offered, which guards against certain things.

If it is to be followed up, as my colleague states, by propositions to endow other hospitals at the same time, I think we may as well stop somewhere with regard to these things, and cannot be properly called upon to endow all the charitable institutions of the city. I understood it was the only hospital there was in the city; it was so stated to me. What has been done in regard to incorporating others at this session I have not noticed.

Mr. MORRILL. The one alluded to by me is not only incorporated but actually in existence and in operation, and has some twenty patients.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see any reason why this should have preference. I certainly should object to the amendment my colleague says he shall propose if this passes. I do not think we should go to so very great extent as to do everything that is to be done for the city. This is a very good institution; but it may not be known to Senators that ever since it has been in operation we have appropriated $6,000 a year for the support of certain patients in it, and $12,000 last year, and again in this very bill there is an appropriation of $12,000 to pay for the actual support of patients there, sixty transient persons who are dependent on the Government.

Whether this should be done or not is a matter for the Senate to decide. The committee decided to strike out the appropriation, and afterwards a majority of the committee decided to let it go with this proviso which has been drawn by the Senator from Ohio. It is a matter in which I have of course not the slightest feeling of any kind or description. It is a matter rather for the Senate to decide upon the general principle whether they will go into these expenditures and pay large sums of money for the erection of provident institutions in this District. Each Senator is competent to decide the matter for himself as is any member of the Committee on Finance. We found it there, we decided to strike it out, and then afterwards in the way I spoke of concluded to let it remain in on getting more information. The question is on concurrence with the committee in striking out this appropriation.

Mr. GUTHRIE. This Providence hospital is under the management of the Catholics, this being a Catholic community. It is the cheapest managed of any institution of this kind I know of, and indeed the Catholic institutions generally are very cheaply and providently managed. I suppose that with the exception of the Government patients, who are paid for out of appropriations we make, they take care mostly of the poor of their own persuasion who fall into their hands, and they are remarkable for their kindness to their own people; and mostly, I believe, those who have fallen into their hands are Irish. Now, as the government of Washington city is in Congress, and such institutions as the Providence hospital are necessary in all cities of this size, I see no real objection to the Government aiding in extending this institution, particularly after it has been found useful and beneficial to the community. I feel disposed to vote for this appropriation. It received the sanction of a very keen committee in the other House, and they sent it here without the guards we now propose to put around it. I am sorry the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is not present. He has taken more interest in this question and is better acquainted with these good Sisters and the facts of the case than any other member of the Finance Committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Perhaps we had better pass this amendment over till to-morrow, and not act on it now in the absence of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to move for an executive session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will defer that motion until the reading of the bill is concluded. There are only nine or ten pages more to be read and most of the amendments are through with.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Very well.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I propose that the amendment be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No objection being made the amendment will be passed over.

The Secretary read the next amendment of the Committee on Finance, which was to insert after line four hundred and ninety-four of section one the following:

To enable the Commissioner of Public Buildings to reimburse the corporation of Washington for expenses incurred in improving streets and avenues passing through and by property of the General Government, $47,255 81.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let that amendment also be passed over. It is a matter in which the Senator from Ohio has an interest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment was to strike out lines five hundred and seven and five hundred and eight of section one, in these words:

For contingent fund for Joint Committee on Library, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line five hundred and eight of section one the following:

For an additional appropriation, to be expended under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library, to decorate the Capitol with such works of art as may be ordered and approved by said committee, as provided by act approved August 18, 1856, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the previous item:

For additional compensation of three laborers employed in the Congressional Library, commencing January 1, 1866, $540; and the compensation of said laborers is hereby fixed at $720 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to the close of the appropriations for "surveying the public lands."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to what extent the estimates for public land surveys in the Territories are reduced. My impression is that these appropriations are so small as really to be of no service.

Mr. FESSENDEN. These items are according to the estimates, I think.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The full amount of the estimates?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is my impression.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that must be a mistake.

Mr. STEWART. There have been several bills passed creating land districts and surveyor generals' offices in the Territories since the estimates were made, so that really there is a demand for more surveying than there was at that time. I have written to the Commissioner calling attention to the fact, and to-morrow morning I expect to have some information on the subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the appropriations are according to the estimates I have no suggestion to make.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to the last item of section one, which is in these words:

For the Government building at Portland, Maine, used as post office, custom-house, and for the United States courts lately destroyed or rendered worthless by fire, to repair or rebuild the same as may prove most advisable, $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to increase that appropriation to $150,000. One hundred thousand dollars was the amount put in by the House of Representatives before we had any report from the person sent down by the Department to examine the building and see what would be necessary. Since then we have received his report, and he says it will cost $150,000; the building is entirely ruined.

Mr. JOHNSON. Are the courts, post office, and custom-house all in one building?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in line six of section two to change the appropriation for the salary of the cashier at the office of the United States depository at Louisville from $1,800 to $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-three of section two to make the appropriation for salary of watchman at the office of the United States depository at Pittsburg $1,095, instead of $900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-one of section two to increase the appropriation for the salary of a clerk in the office of the United States depository at Baltimore from $900 to $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-two of section two to make the appropriation for the salary of messenger in the office of the United States depository at Baltimore $912 50 instead of $900.

Mr. JOHNSON. How do you come at the cents?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know. I know we received a letter from the Treasury saying that that was the salary he got now.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-six of section two to make the appropriation for the salary of the cashier in the office of the United States Assistant Treasurer at San Francisco $3,000 instead of $2,500.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why is $3,000 allowed in San Francisco and only $2,000 in Cincinnati?

Mr. FESSENDEN. On account of the fact that that is the salary the Department has found it necessary to pay in order to keep the man in. The fact is that greenbacks are not worth so much in San Francisco as elsewhere. Under the authority given by an act of Congress the Secretary of the Treasury allows this officer $3,000, and he recommends that that be the salary fixed by law; otherwise he cannot retain his services.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am satisfied.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to increase the appropriation for salary of the book-keeper in the office of the Assistant Treasurer at San Francisco from $2,000 to $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to make the appropriation for salary of the assistant cashier in the office of the United States depository, Cincinnati, $2,000 instead of $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to increase the appropriations for salaries at the office of the depository at Cincinnati, as follows: assistant cashier from $1,000 to $1,050; teller from $1,300 to $1,400; book-keeper from $1,500 to $1,800; and two clerks from $2,500 to $2,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the third section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That so much of an act making additional appropriations, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations, for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, and for other purposes, approved April 7, 1866, as provides "for compensation of the revenue agent stationed at New York, in addition to the sum authorized by act of June 30, 1865, including $1,000 for the current fiscal year, $2,000, and the twenty-fourth section of act entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1863,' approved July 24, 1864, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The Committee on Finance proposed to amend the section by striking out the words "and the twenty-fourth section of an act entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1863,' approved July 24, 1864.'"

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is proper that I should explain what that is, otherwise Senators might not observe it. The words which we propose to strike out were inserted in this section by the House as an amendment, and their effect is to repeal the provision made by law to pay to certain owners of slaves the bounty due on their being enlisted or drafted. The committee thought, on looking at the law, that that was a contract which had been made by the laws of the land, and concluded at any rate to move to strike out this clause repealing it and bring it to the attention of the Senate, so that the Senate could decide for itself. The committee propose to strike out the repeal of the law relative to the bounty for enlisted negroes going to their owners.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued and concluded the reading of the bill, the last item being the following clause at the end of section six, which the Committee on Finance moved to strike out, namely:

For the repair of the custom-house and post office, and the walks and fences adjoining the same, at Middletown, Connecticut, $5,000, the same to be expended by direction of the collector of the port of Middletown.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why strike that out?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because it is transferred to another part of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to withdraw that motion for a moment, that I may ask leave to offer a joint resolution.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I withdraw it for that purpose.

RECOGNITION OF TENNESSEE.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 136) recognizing the government of the State of Tennessee; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state that we have received information during the day that the State of Tennessee has ratified the constitutional amendment, and this is a resolution proposing to recognize the government of that State. I move that it be printed and placed on the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I renew my motion.

Mr. CONNESS. Before that motion is acted on I desire to make a suggestion. Most Senators have business of great consequence pending. We are approaching the end of the session. We are not getting along very rapidly with business. We should either make longer daily sessions, or have evening sessions, one at least, for the transaction of general business. I should like very much to submit a motion for an evening session, if it be acceptable to the Senate; perhaps the change in the weather may make it so.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection to withdrawing my motion to allow a vote to be taken on that proposition.

Mr. STEWART. This evening will be as pleasant a one as we are likely to have.

Mr. CONNESS. With the leave of the Senator from Wisconsin, I submit a motion that the Senate meet this evening for business at half past seven o'clock. I propose, of course, and the whole Senate will agree, that it shall not displace the appropriation bill. There will be no question on that subject. We will give appropriation bills the preference.

Mr. HENDRICKS. We had better go on with the appropriation bill we have commenced.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suggest to the Senator from California—he is probably not aware of it—that I understand the other House has reconsidered its resolution to adjourn on the 25th. That being so, we may have a long session before us yet, and no occasion for evening sittings.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we had better not conclude to have an evening session to-night. Many gentlemen have left the Senate, and they will not be aware of a meeting this evening if one is ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. We have a very full Senate here now; as full as it usually is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Many Senators have gone out, and they may not return. I confess that the labor I have had to do is very oppressive, and I have been unable to attend any evening session yet. I will come when it is absolutely necessary, but I do not feel able to go on with this bill to-night.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator ought to permit those of us who are willing to do business to come here. I submit the motion.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest to my friend from California that he had better make his motion applicable to to-morrow night.

Mr. CONNESS. I will make it for to-morrow.

Several SENATORS. An evening session has already been ordered for to-morrow.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not only have a great many Senators left the Hall, but if this is to be a meeting for the consideration of general business this evening, I must protest against it. Several Senators, to my certain knowledge, are engaged upon a committee to-night which will hold a very important meeting to report business to go upon the very appropriation bill that we are now considering, and they have no other time to attend to it except to-night. If general business is to be considered I desire to be in the Senate, and I cannot be if I attend the committee meeting.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is manifest that if we meet to-morrow night, it will be about as soon as we can now conveniently assemble in the evening. Several Senators have left the Chamber, not expecting a night session. I make the motion that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business. That will get rid of the question, and it is understood that to-morrow night we are to have a night session at any rate.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not think this proceeding on the part of the Senator from Illinois is very civil, to say the least of it. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin had made a motion to go into executive session, and I asked him to withdraw it and he did withdraw it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, I renewed it to get rid of your motion. That was my object. If the Senate votes down my motion yours will come up. It is another way of getting the question; that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CONNESS. That is a debatable question, I believe. Now, if I shall show half the pertinacity that the honorable Senator does on occasions—always, however, in very correct directions—I should perhaps discuss this question to the annoyance of the Senator, if not of the Senate, and I have no doubt of both. The session to-morrow evening, as I learn, is for the special purpose of considering District of Columbia business. So one evening is taken for claims by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] and another evening by the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] for District of Columbia business; but we cannot get an evening session for general business.

I do not wish, of course, to stand in the way of the opinion of the Senate; but I beg Senators to know and understand that many of us feel charged with business that is of consequence to our constituents, and I think we ought to have an opportunity to get it considered by the Senate.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I think if we make any change we had better take two hours in the morning, when it is cool and pleasant, and when we shall not be so disposed to talk.

Mr. CONNESS. I will agree to that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We cannot do that to-morrow morning, because the Committee on Finance has a meeting then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 19, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

Mr. BIDWELL moved that the reading of the Journal of yesterday be dispensed with.

Mr. INGERSOLL and Mr. ALLEY objected.

The Journal of yesterday was then read and approved.

CALIFORNIA AND OREGON RAILROAD.

Mr. BIDWELL. I now call up the motion submitted by me on the 3d instant, to reconsider the vote recommitting to the Committee on Public Lands Senate bill No. 123, granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific railroad, in California, to Portland, in Oregon.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the substitute reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the reading of the substitute.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That the California and Oregon Railroad Company, organized under an act of the State of California, to protect certain parties in and to a railroad survey, to connect Portland, in Oregon, with Marysville, in California, approved April 6, 1863, and such company organized under the laws of Oregon as the Legislature of said State shall hereafter designate, be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to, lay out, locate, construct, finish, and maintain a railroad and telegraph line between the city of Portland, in Oregon, and the Central Pacific railroad, in California, in the manner following, to wit: the said California and Oregon Railroad Company to construct that part of the said railroad and telegraph within the State of California, beginning at some point (to be selected by said company) on the Central Pacific railroad in the Sacramento valley, in the State of California, and running thence northerly, through the Sacramento and Shasta valleys, to the northern boundary of the State of California; and the said Oregon company to construct that part of said railroad and telegraph line within the State of Oregon, beginning at the city of Portland, in Oregon, and running thence southerly through the Willamette, Umpqua, and Rogue river valleys to the southern boundary of Oregon, where the same shall connect with the part aforesaid to be made by the first-named company: Provided, That the company completing its respective part of said railroad and telegraph from either of the termini herein named to the line between California and Oregon before the other company shall have likewise arrived at the same line, shall have the right, and the said company is hereby authorized, to continue in constructing the same beyond the line aforesaid, with the consent of the State in which the unfinished part may lie, upon the terms mentioned in this act, until the said parts shall meet and connect, and the whole line of said railroad and telegraph shall be completed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be, and hereby is, granted to the said companies, their successors and assigns, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores over the line of said railroad, every alternate section of public land, not mineral, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of twenty alternate sections per mile (ten on each side) of said railroad line; and when any of said alternate sections or parts of sections shall be found to have been granted, sold, reserved, occupied by homestead settlers, preempted, or otherwise disposed of, other lands, designated as aforesaid, shall be selected by said companies in lieu thereof, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in alternate sections designated by odd numbers as aforesaid, nearest to and not more than ten miles beyond the limits of said first-named alternate sections; and as soon as the said companies, or either of them, shall file in the office of the Secretary of the Interior a map of the survey of said railroad, or any portion thereof, not less than sixty continuous miles from either terminus, the Secretary of the Interior shall withdraw from sale public lands herein granted on each side of said railroad, so far as located and within the limits before specified. The lands herein granted shall be applied to the building of said road within the States, respectively, wherein they are situated. And the sections and parts of sections of land which shall remain in the United States within the limits of the aforesaid grant shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of public lands when sold: Provided, That bona fide and actual settlers under the preemption laws of the United States may, after due proof of settlement, improvement, and occupation, as now provided by law, purchase the same at the price fixed for said lands at the date of such settlement, improvement, and occupation: And provided also, That settlers under the provisions of the homestead act, who comply with the terms and requirements of said act, shall be entitled, within the limits of said grant, to patents for an amount not exceeding eighty acres of the land so reserved by the United States, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the right of way through the public lands be, and the same is hereby, granted to said companies for the construction of said railroad and telegraph line; and the right, power, and authority are hereby given to said companies to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road earth, stone, timber, water, and other materials for the construction thereof. Said right of way is granted to said railroad to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of said railroad where it may pass over the public lands, including all necessary grounds for stations, buildings, workshops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, water stations, or any other structures required in the construction and operating of said road.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That whenever the said companies, or either of them, shall have twenty or more consecutive miles of any portion of said railroad and telegraph line ready for the service contemplated by this act, the President of the United States shall appoint three commissioners, whose compensation shall be paid by said company, to examine the same, and if it shall appear that twenty consecutive miles of railroad and telegraph shall have been completed and equipped in all respects as required by this act, the said commissioners shall so report under oath to the President of the United States, and thereupon patents shall issue to said companies, or either of them, as the case may be, for the lands hereinbefore granted, to the extent of and continuous with the completed section of said railroad and telegraph line as aforesaid; and from time to time, whenever twenty or more consecutive miles of the said road and telegraph shall be completed and equipped as aforesaid, patents shall in like manner issue upon the report of the said commissioners, and so on until the entire railroad and telegraph authorized by this act shall have been constructed, and the patents of the lands herein granted shall have been issued.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the grants aforesaid are made upon the condition that the said companies shall keep said railroad and telegraph in repair and use, and shall at all times transport the mails upon said railroad, and transmit dispatches by said telegraph line for the Government of the United States, when required so to do by any Department thereof, and that the Government shall at all times have the preference in the use of said railroad and telegraph therefor at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, not to exceed the rates paid by private parties for the same kind of service. And said railroad shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free of all toll or other charges upon the transportation of the property or troops of the United States; and the same shall be transported over said road at the cost, charge, and expense of the corporations or companies owning or operating the same, when so required by the Government of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the said companies shall file their assent to this act in the Department of the Interior within one year after the passage hereof, and shall complete the first section of twenty miles of said railroad and telegraph within two years, and at least twenty miles in each year thereafter, and the whole on or before the 1st day of July, 1875; and the said railroad shall be of the same gauge as the Central Pacific railroad of California, and be connected therewith.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the said companies named in this act are hereby required to operate and use the portions or parts of said railroad and telegraph mentioned in section one of this act for all purposes of transportation, travel, and communication, so far as the Government and public are concerned, as one connected and continuous line; and in such operation and use to afford and secure to each other equal advantages and facilities as to rates, time, and transportation, without any discrimination whatever, on pain of forfeiting the full amount of damage sustained on account of such discrimination, to be sued for and recovered in any court of the United States, or of any State of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That in case the said companies shall fail to comply with the terms and conditions required, namely, by not filing their assent thereto as provided in section six of this act, or by not completing the same as provided in said section, this act shall be null and void, and all the lands not conveyed by patent to said company or companies, as the case may be, at the date of any such failure, shall revert to the United States. And in case the said road and telegraph line shall not be kept in repair and fit for use, after the same shall have been completed, Congress may pass an act to put the same in repair and use, and may direct the income of said road and telegraph line to be thereafter devoted to the United States, to repay all expenditures caused by the default and neglect of said companies, or either of them, as the case may be, or may fix pecuniary responsibility, not exceeding the value of the lands granted by this act.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the said California and Oregon Railroad Company and the said Oregon Company shall be governed by the provisions of the general railroad and telegraph laws of their respective States, as to the construction and management of the said railroad and telegraph line hereinbefore authorized in all matters not provided for in this act. Wherever the word "company" or "companies" is used in this act it shall be construed to embrace the words "their associates, successors, and assigns," the same as if the words had been inserted or thereto annexed.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all mineral lands shall be excepted from the operation of this act; but where the same shall contain timber, so much of the timber thereon as shall be required to construct said road over such mineral land is hereby granted to said companies: Provided, That the term mineral lands shall not include lands containing coal and iron.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the said companies named in this act shall obtain the consent of the Legislatures of their respective States, and be governed by the statutory regulations thereof in all matters pertaining to the right of way, wherever the said road and telegraph line shall not pass over or through the public lands of the United States.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of said California and Oregon railroad companies, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. BIDWELL. This is the bill which has been before the House two or three times, and after being sent to the Committee on Public Lands was reported upon favorably. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from California whether the provision of the second section of the substitute is intended to prohibit the United States from allowing preemption on its own lands. I will read the clause to which I refer:

And the sections and parts of sections of land which shall remain in the United States within the limits of the aforesaid grant shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of public lands when sold, nor shall any of said lands become subject to sale at private entry until the same shall have been first offered at public sale to the highest bidder at or above the minimum price aforesaid.

Mr. BIDWELL. The objection of the gentleman from Iowa is obviated by an amendment of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOLMES. The Committee on Public Lands have stricken out the latter portion of the clause which the gentleman from Iowa has read. The language which they have stricken out is the following:

Nor shall any of said lands become subject to sale at private entry until the same shall have been first offered at public sale to the highest bidder at or above the minimum price aforesaid.

This amendment obviates, I think, the objection of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman's explanation is satisfactory.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading and read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill, Mr. BIDWELL called the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. BIDWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 50) to amend the fifth section of an act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, so as to extend the time within which the provisions of said act shall be accepted and such colleges established;

An act (H. R. No. 521) for the benefit of Henry Horne;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) for the relief of John Wells & Sons, of Baltimore;

An act (H. R. No. 213) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 334) to fix the number of judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to change certain judicial circuits;

An act (H. R. No. 354) for the relief of Edward P. McKinney, of Binghamton, New York, late captain and assistant commissary of subsistence;

An act (H. R. No. 421) for the relief of James G. Holland, late acting assistant paymaster United States Navy;

An act (H. R. No. 448) to authorize the construction of a railroad through certain lands of the United States in Kansas;

An act (H. R. No. 466) erecting the Territory of Montana into a surveying district, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 517) for the relief of Liston H. Pearce;

An act (H. R. No. 518) for the relief of the owners of the bark Maria Henry;

An act (H. R. No. 526) for the relief of the heirs of Horace I. Hodges;

An act (H. R. No. 555) for the relief of the owners of the Hawaiian bark Kamehameha V;

An act (H. R. No. 557) to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of Benicia and the town of Santa Cruz, in the State of California;

An act (H. R. No. 629) for the relief of William G. Lee;

An act (H. R. No. 695) for the relief of William H. Wheeler, of Bangor, Maine; and

An act (H. R. No. 727) to regulate the registering of vessels.

RETRENCHMENT.

The SPEAKER announced the following joint select committee on retrenchment on the part of the House: ROBERT S. HALE of New York, ROBERT C. SCHENCK of Ohio, THOMAS A. JENCKES of Rhode Island, SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, and JOHN L. THOMAS of Maryland.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a privileged question, and submit the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when Congress adjourns it will adjourn to meet again on Saturday, the 1st day of December next, unless sooner summoned by the Presiding Officers of both Houses, which power, in case of emergency, is hereby granted to them.

Mr. FINCK. I rise to a question of order, and submit that this resolution cannot be entertained as a privileged question, because it goes beyond the matter of adjournment and proposes by this legislation to confer upon the Presiding Officers of the two Houses new powers not now authorized by any law.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Under the Constitution Congress cannot meet at any other than the regular period named in the Constitution, except on the call of the President of the United States, or in pursuance of a law duly approved by him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, in reply to that point, that the President of the United States has power to convene Congress at such time between the regular sessions as he may deem fit. But the Chair is of opinion (although this is a new question) that if the two Houses take a recess they can authorize their Presiding Officers to call them together at an earlier day than that which they have named for their reassembling. It is equivalent to an indefinite recess. The Constitution allows Congress to adjourn for any period exceeding three days, both Houses concurring therein, and declares that resolutions of adjournment shall not be sent to the President.

Mr. STEVENS. As several gentlemen desire that the morning hour shall commence, and as a number of members desire information in regard to this question, I move to postpone this subject until to-morrow immediately after the morning hour, and that the resolution be printed.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Can this resolution be introduced without unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that it can, as it relates to adjournment.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Is it a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. FINCK. My point is that it confers additional power upon the Presiding Officers of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has overruled that point of order, on the ground that, as the two Houses can take a recess, it would seem that they may authorize their Presiding Officers to call them together before the expiration of the time fixed for the recess. For instance, the House might, on taking a recess from Thursday till Monday, authorize its Presiding Officer to call them together on Saturday, if any exigency should require it. If one House could do this, may not both Houses, when taking a longer recess, if they concur? Both Houses could, under the Constitution, resolve to adjourn till the first Monday of next month, both Houses concurring, and if a quorum was then present could adjourn similarly throughout the recess, from month to month.

Mr. FINCK. I do not know that the Chair fully understands the point I make. I submit that, so far as this resolution proposes to confer additional power on the Speaker of the House and the Presiding Officer of the Senate, it is not a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. It does confer additional power, but the Chair thinks it is, notwithstanding, a privileged question. All questions in regard to adjournment, whether for one day's adjournment, for three days' adjournment, for a recess, or for an adjournment sine die, and all questions growing out of the matter of adjournment are held as privileged questions. But they of course require a majority to adopt them. They have always been entertained by Speakers when there was no other business before the House.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask to have the resolution again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. TRIMBLE. If we have authority to pass this resolution I think it would be as well to provide in it that in the event the Speaker of this House and the President of the Senate should disagree as to when Congress should be reconvened, some one should be named who should decide between them.

The SPEAKER. The resolution requires the assent of both Presiding Officers.

Mr. FINCK. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw the resolution, giving notice that I will submit it again to-morrow.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. LATHAM, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; on the adoption of which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed of the Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1865, one hundred and sixty-five thousand copies; one hundred and forty-five thousand copies for the members of this House, and twenty thousand copies for the Commissioner of Agriculture.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. LATHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CANAL AND SEWERAGE COMPANY.

Mr. CONKLING demanded the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated that the regular order of business was the unfinished business of the morning hour yesterday, being Senate bill No. 190, to incorporate the District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company, the pending question being on seconding the demand for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I cannot yield to anybody.

Mr. ALLEY. I move that the bill be laid upon the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND. This provides for the transfer of this canal.

Mr. F. THOMAS. It is the same old bill.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Is it in order to provide that this canal shall be disposed of to the highest bidder?

The SPEAKER. Not now.

Mr. ALLEY. That is the amendment I wished to offer, but which the gentleman from Illinois would not let me get in.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 58, nays 53, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Boutwell, Boyer, Broomall, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Eckley, Eldridge, Farquhar, Finck, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hochkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Kasson, Kelley, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, William Lawrence, Le Blond, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Orth, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Scofield, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taber, Taylor, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, and Whaley—58.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Delano, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Holmes, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Ketcham, Koontz, Ladin, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McKuer, Meurer, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Stevens, Strouse, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Welker, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—53.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bromwell, Bundy, Chanler, Cook, Cullem, Culver, Darling, Defrees, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Eggleston, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, Julian, Kelso, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Marshall, Marvin, McIndoe, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Noell, Patterson, Pomeroy, Price, Rogers, Rollins, Rousseau, Schenck, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stillwell, Thayer, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Williams, James F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—71.

So the bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table. I am willing it shall be postponed to any day gentlemen may agree on.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. WENTWORTH demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. INGERSOLL demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was then laid upon the table.

LEVY COURT IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WELKER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back without amendment Senate bill No. 325, to give certain powers to the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MINING AND MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

Mr. WELKER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back without amendment Senate bill No. 178, to incorporate the Metropolitan Mining and Manufacturing Company.

The bill was read.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to offer an amendment, to strike out from the sixth section the words, "and State of Virginia," so as to confine the operations of the company to the District of Columbia, where Congress has unquestionable power to create corporations.

Mr. WELKER. I decline to yield for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope, then, that the previous question will not be seconded, so that my amendment may be offered.

On seconding the demand for the previous question no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. DAVIS and WELKER.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty-seven, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time. It was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECESS OF CONGRESS—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state in regard to the resolution offered this morning by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that while he entertains the opinion which he then stated to the House in reference to its privileged character, relating as it does to the adjournment of Congress, yet inasmuch as the subject is a delicate one as enlarging the powers of the two Presiding Officers, and might be important in its consequences, he will, if the question is presented to-morrow, submit it, as the rules authorize him to do, to the House for its own decision, as that doubtless will be more satisfactory to all the members than to have it settled by a decision of the Chair.

Mr. STEVENS. That will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to call attention—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

NATIONAL CAPITAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. MERCUR, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back House bill No. 234, to incorporate the National Capital Insurance Company, with a substitute.

The substitute was read.

Mr. HALE. I ask if it has been printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HALE. Is it in order to move a re-committal?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MERCUR] has the floor.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman explain it in a few words?

Mr. MERCUR. It is an ordinary bill for the incorporation of fire and marine insurance companies.

Mr. HALE. I thought it was an Insurance Bureau.

Mr. KASSON. I would like to understand one feature in regard to the lien on property to secure premium notes.

Mr. MERCUR. That has passed out of my mind. The Clerk may read it. The committee had so many of these bills before them that I cannot remember the distinctive features of each. They were all acted on with care and deliberation.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to ask whether the attention of the committee has been specially directed to the corporators to know who they are. I know there is a set of shysters about the capital, and as I do not know these corporators, I would like to be satisfied that they are applying in good faith for an insurance company that is to be put in operation by themselves, and that they are not getting privileges from Congress with the expectation of selling out.

Mr. INGERSOLL. As the gentleman seems to be acquainted with the shysters of the city, perhaps the Clerk had better read the names.

Mr. SCHENCK. Just as I have had occasion to be engaged in the prosecution of them with other criminals.

The Clerk read the names of the corporators as follows: "Green Adams, Erastus Poulson, Joseph J. Coombs, Robert Leech, John B. Clark, jr., G. P. Reznor, Fergus M. Blair, Robert L. Owen, Joseph M. Parish, and others."

Mr. JOHNSON. I would inquire whether they are citizens of Washington or not.

Mr. MERCUR. I understand that a part of them are, and a part are not.

Mr. JOHNSON. Some, I know, are not.

Mr. MERCUR. It appeared before the committee that they are men of character and good standing. One of them, Mr. Poulson of Philadelphia, is personally known to me.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I desire to ask whether the powers and privileges granted by this act can be exercised or enjoyed without the bounds of the District of Columbia without the consent of the States.

Mr. MERCUR. No, sir; not without the consent of the States. You will find in all these charters language like this, that they may exercise their power here or elsewhere, subject to the regulations of the places; and most of the States prescribe the conditions under which foreign corporations may exercise jurisdiction within their limits. We have provided the usual guards; and I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. MERCUR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM COOK.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the Senate No. 277, for the relief of William Cook.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHESAPEAKE AND POTOMAC CANAL.

Mr. McCULLOUGH, also from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the Senate No. 281, to authorize the Chesapeake and Potomac River Tidewater Canal Company to enter the District of Columbia and extend their canal to the Anacostia river at any point above Benning's bridge.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, pending which the morning hour expired, and the bill went over until Saturday next.

SAFETY OF STEAMBOAT TRAVEL.

Mr. O'NEILL made the following report from a committee of conference:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 477) further to provide for the safety of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, to regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives agree to the first, second, third, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, and twenty-first amendments, as made by the Senate.

That the Senate recede from the fourth amendment, with a modification of the clause, as follows: strike out all after the word "under," in line ten, section two, and insert in place thereof the words "any circumstances;" and that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from the eighteenth and nineteenth amendments.

That the House agree to the twentieth amendment, with an amendment as follows: after the words "for the district of Portland, Oregon, $700" insert as follows: "to the supervising inspector of the Pacific coast, $2,500; to other supervising inspectors, $2,000 each;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Z. CHANDLER.

GEORGE EDMUNDS,

J. W. NESMITH,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

CHARLES O'NEILL,

D. C. McRUER,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages in writing from the President of the United States were delivered to the House by Mr. EDWARD COOPER, his Secretary; who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 702) granting a pension to Mrs. Charlotte E. Reed;

An act (H. R. No. 739) for the relief of Samantha Rader;

An act (H. R. No. 741) granting a pension to Jonathan W. Beach; and

An act (H. R. No. 742) for the relief of the minor children of Salvador Accardi, deceased.

PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S BUREAU.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I now call up the report of the select committee appointed April 30, 1866, to investigate the statements and charges made by Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING, in his place, against Provost Marshal General Fry and his bureau—whether any frauds have been perpetrated in his office in connection with the recruiting service; also to examine into the statements made by General Fry in his communication to Hon. Mr. BLAINE, read in the House.

The resolutions reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Resolved, That all the statements contained in the letter of General James B. Fry to Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE, a member of this House, bearing date the 27th of April, A. D. 1866, and which was read in this House on the 30th of April, A. D. 1866, in so far as such statements impute to Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING, a member of this House, any criminal, illegal, unpatriotic, or otherwise improper conduct or motives, either as to the matter of his procuring himself to be employed by the Government of the United States in the prosecution of military offenses in the State of New York, in the management of such prosecutions, in taking compensation therefor, or in any other charge, are wholly without foundation in truth, and for their publication there were, in the judgment of this House, no facts connected with said prosecutions furnishing either a palliation or an excuse.

Resolved, That General Fry, an officer of the Government of the United States, and head of one of its military bureaus, in writing and publishing these accusations named in the preceding resolution, and which, owing to the crimes and wrongs which they impute to a member of this body, are of a nature deeply injurious to the official and personal character, influence, and privileges of such member, and their publication originating, as in the judgment of the House they did, in no misapprehension of facts, but in the resentment and passion of their author, was guilty of a gross violation of the privileges of such member and of this House, and his conduct in that regard merits and receives its unqualified disapprobation.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to inquire whether there is any minority report in this case, or an objecting report of any kind.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. There is no minority report. This is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. Unless some one controverts the report, I do not think the time of the House should be taken up with reading an elaborate report.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I asked for the reading, as I supposed it was a matter of right.

The SPEAKER. Any member has the right to have the report read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The select committee, appointed April 30, 1866, to investigate the statements and charges made by Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING, in his place, against Provost Marshal General Fry and his bureau—whether any frauds have been perpetrated in his office in connection with the recruiting service; also to examine into the statements made by General Fry in his communication to Hon. Mr. BLAINE, read in the House, having completed their labors as to one branch of their investigation, submit the following report:

When your committee was about to enter upon the performance of the duties enjoined upon it by the orders of the House it became apparent that a full investigation of all matters embraced within the scope of its authority could not be completed during the present session of Congress. In view of the time, labor, and public expense necessarily involved in the performance of the work, your committee had under consideration the propriety of making a preliminary report to the House, setting forth the magnitude of the task assigned to it, and asking for further instructions in the premises. But in consideration of the fact that the character of a member of the House of Representatives had been publicly assailed with serious charges in a letter emanating from the head of an important bureau of the Government, addressed to another member of the House of Representatives and by him caused to be read to the House, and thus made a part of the published and permanent record of its proceedings, we deemed that it was the privilege of the member thus gravely charged, and due also to the House itself, that your committee should proceed without delay to the investigation of at least that branch of the case which relates to the charges preferred by Provost Marshal General Fry against Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING. Your committee did this the more readily, as the member thus charged pleaded and insisted upon his privilege to have an early investigation of that branch of the case, and no objection was interposed by any party to its separate consideration and prompt decision, leaving the remaining branch of the investigation relating to the conduct of the Bureau of the Provost Marshal General to the future action of the committee.

Your committee, therefore, as will appear in the journal of its proceedings, have thus far confined their investigation to the charges against Mr. CONKLING contained in the letter of General Fry to Mr. BLAINE, and excluded all testimony bearing upon the conduct of General Fry as Provost Marshal General, except so far as that was deemed necessary to a full investigation of the charges against Mr. CONKLING. The testimony touching the Hoboken credits and the disposal of the $54,000 bounty money arising therefrom was admitted to show, as was alleged, a settled purpose on the part of General Fry to injure Mr. CONKLING, dating back long anterior to the BLAINE letter, and evinced by his alleged attempt to procure by a corrupt bargain testimony to be used against Mr. CONKLING in relation to certain alleged frauds in the Utica district of the State of New York. Your committee deemed it a legitimate subject of inquiry to investigate to that extent the motive of General Fry, and its connection, if any, with the animus which prompted the letter to Mr. BLAINE. Both parties were therefore allowed full opportunity to introduce testimony relating to that point.

The first statement of the letter of General Fry to be investigated under the rule adopted by the committee is as follows:

"In the summer of 1863 Mr. CONKLING made a case for himself by telegraphing to the War Department that the provost marshal of his district required legal advice, which he was hereupon empowered to give."

The committee understand this charge to be that Mr. CONKLING secured his own employment professionally by the Department, by telegraphing that the provost marshal of his district required legal advice, and that his motive and object in transmitting the dispatch was to secure such employment. Unless this is the meaning of the words of the letter, there is no significance at all to be attached to them, in the connection in which they are used. The evidence shows that, in the latter part of July, 1863, a man named Hobson was arrested in the twenty-first district of New York as a deserter. A writ of habeas corpus was issued by Judge Bacon, justice of the supreme court, and placed in the hands of the sheriff of Oneida county. A return was made by the officer having the deserter in custody, which return showed that the man was held by the military authorities as a deserter from the military service of the United States. This return was adjudged insufficient by the judge who issued the writ, and a writ of attachment was ordered and issued against the officer for declining to bring the deserter before the judge, in obedience to the writ of habeas corpus. A direct conflict had arisen between the military authorities of the United States and the authorities of the State of New York, in reference to which very great excitement had arisen among the people of the district. The district attorney was absent. Mr. Kernan, the Representative from that district, had been engaged as counsel against the Government, and the danger of a collision between the national and State authorities was immediate and palpable. In the emergency, and acting at the request and upon advice of eminent citizens of the district, Mr. CONKLING sent to the Secretary of War the following dispatch:

"In the absence of all of us who could aid him professionally, the provost marshal here was served with a habeas corpus to produce a deserter; he obeyed the order not to produce, and so returned. The judge held this insufficient, and issued attachment. He telegraphed the district attorney and his assistant. They are absent and engaged. What shall we do?"

"R. CONKLING."

It will be observed that the dispatch does not inform the Secretary of War that the provost marshal required legal advice, but was a succinct statement of the actual state of facts, and a request that the Secretary should direct what should be done in an emergency which excited the apprehensions of the friends of the Government. In the opinion of the committee, Mr. CONKLING did only what he was fully justified in doing in this matter, and there is no evidence tending, however remotely, to show that in sending the dispatch he was influenced by any merely personal motive.

The second statement of General Fry's letter which has claimed the attention of the committee is as follows:

"In April, 1865, Mr. Charles A. Dana, then Assistant Secretary of War, without notifying me, had Mr. CONKLING appointed to investigate all frauds in enlistments in western New York, with the stipulation that he should be commissioned judge and advocate for the prosecution of any cases brought to trial, and he was appointed to prosecute before a general court-martial Major J. A. Haddock."

Mr. Dana vested him, by several orders issued in the name of the Secretary of War, without the sanction of Mr. Stanton, with the most extraordinary powers. Among these was the right to examine the dispatches in all the telegraph offices in the western division of New York, which enabled a violation of the sanctity of personal and business correspondence."

In another part of the letter Mr. Dana is spoken of as the friend of Mr. CONKLING; and the committee understand the imputation of this portion of the letter to be, that Mr. Dana, of his own motion, without notice to General Fry, and without the sanction of the Secretary of War, and by some management or understanding between Mr. Dana and Mr. CONKLING, appointed Mr. CONKLING to investigate frauds in enlistments in western New York, and vested him with extraordinary powers.

It has been proved before the committee by the testimony of the Secretary of War that about the 30th of March, 1865, the Secretary of War directed Mr.

Dana to telegraph to Mr. CONKLING to come to Washington to consult with the Secretary in relation to certain frauds in western New York, in regard to which a report had been made by Major Luddington, an inspecting officer, who had been sent to New York for the purpose of investigation. The Secretary of War testifies that he had himself determined that Mr. CONKLING should take charge of the investigation of those frauds, if he would do so, and for that purpose directed the dispatch to be sent to Mr. CONKLING requesting him to come to Washington. On the 2d of April Mr. CONKLING came to Washington and had an interview with the Secretary of War, who then urged him to take charge of the investigation referred to, stating, at the same time, that "he considered a diligent and rigorous investigation as absolutely necessary to the safety of the country; that we were at that time engaged in the midst of a draft; General Grant had commenced his movements, and that everything depended upon keeping the Army up, and the means of keeping the Army up was the diligent and vigorous recruiting which was then going on." That Mr. CONKLING expressed himself very reluctant to engage in it. The Secretary of War expressed to Mr. CONKLING an unqualified opinion that there was nothing in the service which he asked of him incompatible with his position as a member of Congress elect, and gave him reasons at length for that opinion, and insisted that it was as much the duty of Mr. CONKLING to use his legal knowledge in aid of the Government in carrying on the war as to shoulder a musket to drive the enemy out of this department, and that Mr. CONKLING was not at liberty to deny the Secretary of War the benefit of his services.

The Secretary of War also testified that, if there was anything wrong in Mr. CONKLING's taking that duty at the time, the wrong rests on the shoulders of the Secretary of War, and not on Mr. CONKLING's.

That the Secretary is the person that ought to be responsible, in the public judgment, for forcing upon Mr. CONKLING what the Secretary regarded as a public duty; and that he had no other reason for forcing it upon Mr. CONKLING than the facts that he thought it a vital duty, and knew Mr. CONKLING to be competent to perform it.

The Secretary of War directed Mr. Dana to prepare the papers for Mr. CONKLING in case he should conclude to render the services required, and the papers prepared and given to Mr. CONKLING are in conformity with the instructions of the Secretary of War. Mr. CONKLING, after consultation with the Judge Advocate General, whose views corresponded with those of the Secretary, undertook to render the services required.

It is clear from the evidence that, so far as Mr. CONKLING's appointment having been made by Mr. Dana, and the powers with which he was clothed having been vested in him by Mr. Dana, the appointment and the powers accompanying it were conferred upon Mr. CONKLING by the Secretary of War himself; that Mr. Dana had nothing to do with the matter except to prepare the papers under the specific direction of the Secretary. These powers were specified in the following papers:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, April 3, 1865.

SIR: I am instructed by the Secretary of War to authorize you to investigate all cases of fraud in the provost marshal's office of the western division of New York, and all misdemeanors connected with recruiting. You will, from time to time, make report to the Department of the progress of your labors, and will apply for any special authority for which you may have occasion. The Judge Advocate General will be instructed to issue to you an appointment as special judge advocate for the prosecution of any cases that may be brought to trial before a military tribunal. You will also appear in behalf of this Department in any cases that it may be deemed more expedient to bring before the civil tribunals.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
C. A. DANA,
Assistant Secretary of War.

Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, April 3, 1865.

Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING having been appointed by the Secretary of War to investigate transactions connected with recruiting in the western division of New York, all telegraph companies and operators are respectfully requested to afford him access to any dispatches which he may require for the purpose of detecting frauds and bringing criminals to trial.

By order of the Secretary of War:
C. A. DANA,
Assistant Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, April 3, 1865.

Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING having been appointed by the Secretary of War to investigate transactions connected with recruiting in the western division of New York, all provost marshals and other military officers are hereby directed to give him free access to all their official records and correspondence, and to furnish him certified copies of any papers that he may require.

By order of the Secretary of War:
C. A. DANA,
Assistant Secretary of War.

The committee have failed to discover that any extraordinary powers were conferred upon Mr. CONKLING without the sanction of the Secretary of War, which enabled him to violate the sanctity of personal business correspondence. It is certain that no complaint that the sanctity of any personal business correspondence has been violated by Mr. CONKLING under that authority has been brought to the notice of the committee. Both the Secretary of War and Mr. Dana testify that the powers given to Mr. CONKLING were those usually given in such cases, and in regard to this paper the Secretary of War testifies: "I do not understand the paper as giving him any right to make use of private despatches, any way, but to be a request only to telegraph officers to afford him facilities for detecting frauds and bringing criminals to trial. The other, as to the provost marshals giving him free access to their records and correspondence, is a general authority which is given in all such cases, and is necessary for any person engaged in these investigations to exercise."

It appears from the testimony of Mr. Dana that the appointment of Mr. CONKLING was not made without notifying General Fry, but that on the 3d of April, the day of the date of the papers which were given to Mr. CONKLING, and the day on which he signified his willingness to undertake the duty, General Fry was informed by Mr. Dana that the Secretary of War had employed Mr. CONKLING for this purpose, and had directed that he (Mr. Fry) should put into Mr. CONKLING's hands at once all the papers relating to Major Haddock.

The statement of General Fry's letter in relation to the sums received, or reported to have been received, by Mr. CONKLING, being adverted to in another place, the next allegation of the letter is as follows:

"But, as hereafter shown, he was zealous in preventing prosecutions at Utica as he was in making them at Elmira, and the main ground of difficulty between Mr. CONKLING and myself has been that I wanted exposure at both places, while he wanted concealment at one."

In investigating the charge contained in this paragraph, the committee directed their inquiries first to the question whether Mr. CONKLING had been zealous to prevent prosecution of persons charged with fraud at Utica in the manner particularly specified in the letter, or in any other manner; and, second, whether Mr. CONKLING had manifested any desire that any frauds upon the Government at Utica should be concealed or any inquiry in relation to them suppressed.

In considering these questions it became proper for the committee to determine the extent of the duty which had been imposed upon Mr. CONKLING by the Secretary of War, and upon this question the understanding of the Secretary of War, by whom the appointment was made, is thus given in his testimony: "I do not think that Mr. CONKLING was authorized or directed to institute prosecutions against any one disconnected with Major Haddock. Major Haddock was the chief of the department; it was alleged that he had accomplices; that these frauds were the result of combinations and conspiracies, official and non-official, for the purpose of plundering the public Treasury; to confine the power simply to Major Haddock's case would have been ineffectually narrow. The power was therefore given him to investigate everything in connection with that transaction, and it would have been unwise for the Government to limit it or confine the investigation within a narrower compass than is expressed in the papers. But the assignment of Mr. CONKLING on the court-martial determines the question, the order detailing the court and assigning him to act as judge advocate in the trial of Major Haddock and no other person. All that Mr. CONKLING could do in respect to other persons than Major Haddock would be to prefer charges or proofs against others besides Major Haddock, and then it would require the order of the Department detailing this or some other court of which he might or might not be a member as judge advocate, for the purpose of bringing those cases to trial. Mr. CONKLING could put nobody on trial, except by the special order of the Department."

No evidence was given before the committee tending to show any direct effort on the part of Mr. CONKLING to prevent the prosecution of any one in Utica or elsewhere, and the inquiry was therefore narrowed to the question whether he had in any manner neglected to communicate to the Department information which he ought to have given in relation to frauds upon the Government, and especially whether he had neglected to do so because such information would have been used against particular individuals or persons living in Utica district. In the inquiry upon this point the testimony was confined, by the ruling of the committee, to the single fact whether frauds existed which had come to the knowledge of Mr. CONKLING, and which he had not made known to the Department. Evidence offered in relation to alleged frauds in the Utica district, of which Mr. CONKLING was not shown to have had any knowledge, was not received by the committee; nor was evidence received in relation to matters concerning which full information had been given to the Government; the committee believing that it was the duty of the War Department to determine what prosecutions should be instituted when the facts were within the knowledge of the Department, and that Mr. CONKLING discharged his whole duty in that behalf when the information which he had himself received had been communicated to the War Department.

It is true that considerable evidence has been incorporated in the record which would have been excluded by a strict adherence to the rule adopted by the committee. This has arisen from the fact that much of the testimony was taken while the House was in session, and by different members of the committee, not having leave to sit during the sessions of the House, and it was consequently impossible for the members of the committee taking the testimony to understand the precise connection of the testimony offered with that which had been taken by some other member of the committee, and it was deemed best to be more careful not to exclude any evidence from the record that might possibly be pertinent to the subject-matter of inquiry, than not to admit any that might be wholly irrelevant.

The specifications given in General Fry's letter, under the charge that "as hereafter shown, Mr. CONKLING was as zealous in preventing prosecutions at Utica as he was in making them at Elmira," are as follows:

"That Mr. CONKLING complained both to the President and to the War Department of the action of General Fry in the removal of Captain Richardson (the first provost marshal of Mr. CONKLING's district) upon a report of Judge Advocate Turner that the proofs in his case disclosed a reckless persistence in fraudulent practices."

"The second issue was as to the testimony of Captain Crandall, after I had secured his removal from duty on the recommendation of Major Luddington, who thoroughly inspected the district, and reported that though not legally guilty he had morally perpetrated most glaring, inexcusable fraud on the Government, and that he had quieted his conscience by casuistry and regulated his actions by the counsel of unscrupulous legal advisers. Mr. CONKLING failed to get Captain Crandall restored."

"The third issue was as to the Government's employing counsel to defend Captain Crandall after he had been relieved, and had carried with him, in violation of the orders of the Department, some $20,000 local bounty deposited with him in behalf of recruits, and in regard to which he got into litigation. In this Mr. CONKLING failed."

The words "as hereafter shown," as they appear in connection in General Fry's letter, that Mr. CONKLING was as zealous "in preventing prosecutions at Utica as in making them at Elmira," must refer to the three specifications above given, because, unless shown in one or the other of those specifications, it is not shown at all in General Fry's letter that Mr. CONKLING was zealous "in preventing prosecutions at Utica," or that "he wanted concealment there." It was contended before the committee that these words, "as hereafter shown," limited the charges against Mr. CONKLING to the three specifications above given. If this be so, the specifications signify fail to bear out the charge made. In the case of Captain Richardson, it was not the duty of Mr. CONKLING to have reported his case to the Government, for the reason that the Government already had a full report of the case from Judge Advocate Turner, and it was for the Department, and not Mr. CONKLING, to determine what action should be taken thereon, and because several months before the appointment of Mr. CONKLING to investigate frauds in the western division of New York, this matter had been placed in the hands of William A. Dart, the United States district attorney, who had charge of the case when Mr. CONKLING received his appointment. Mr. CONKLING manifestly did not attempt to prevent the prosecution of Captain Richardson by neglecting to furnish information which was within his knowledge and not within the knowledge of the Government, nor by neglecting to institute proceedings against Richardson, because that was a matter with which he had nothing to do. Did he attempt to prevent prosecutions at Utica by complaining of the action of General Fry in the removal of Captain Richardson? The facts are as follows:

December 30, 1864, Mr. CONKLING addressed a letter to the President of the United States, in which the fact of the removal of Captain Richardson is stated, and the belief of the writer that it had been accomplished by the efforts of Major Haddock, in whom the loyal people had no confidence, and who was suspected of fraudulent practices, (which suspicion was afterward sworn to have been well founded.) The letter refers to a rumor that charges had been made against Captain Richardson, based, as the letter states, upon affidavits prepared by those whose character does not raise a presumption in favor of their motives. And then the writer says: "Of course I have nothing to say as to the truth of the charges, if there are charges, as I do not know what they are. I ought, however, to say that in common with others I have kept a pretty close watch upon Captain Richardson, and that I have never discovered any corrupt practices in him. But the point I wish to submit is his being thus summarily disgraced without knowledge of the ground and without his being heard." The letter states that the supervisors through whom the matter have been raised had signed and lodged with the writer an earnest protest against the proceedings. No complaint is made in the letter against General Fry by name, or by special reference. The letter referred to was written by Mr. CONKLING, and the concurrence of the following eminent citizens of that district was indorsed thereon: Hon. W. J. Bacon, Ellis H. Roberts, Hon. Ward Hunt, Erastus Clark, T. R. Walker, and C. H. Hopkins. The committee have failed to discover any evidence of any unworthy or improper motive on the part of Mr. CONKLING, or the other gentlemen concurring in that letter, nor can the committee perceive how it is possible to imagine that the letter affords any indication, however remote, that Mr. CONKLING was zealous to prevent the prosecution of Mr. Richardson, or desirous of concealing his acts from scrutiny. Indeed, the main object of the letter seems to have been to ask an investigation.

In relation to Captain Crandall no concealment was possible, for the reason that a full report had been made by Major Luddington before Mr. CONKLING is shown to have had anything to say or do in reference to him; and surely Mr. CONKLING could not be in fault for not prosecuting him, when, as stated in Major Luddington's report, he had incurred no legal guilt; consequently it is not shown by any evidence in relation to Captain Crandall that Mr. CONKLING was zealous in preventing prosecutions at Utica, or desired concealment of any frauds there. And here the committee might leave this matter of Captain Crandall, but it is considered but just to Mr. CONKLING that a true statement of his connection with matters relating to Captain Crandall should be given. It appears from the evidence of Hon. Ward

Hunt that Mr. Crandall was selected and recommended as a proper person to succeed Captain Richardson by said Hunt, Judge Bacon, and other citizens of the district; that Mr. CONKLING refused to have anything to do with the selection or designation of any individual for that position. Judge Hunt testifies that "Mr. Crandall was selected as being an eminently honest and upright man, and a man of the best reputation and character. It was believed by every one that if there was to be found in the county one honest man he was the one, and that the judgment of the citizens of Oneida county is unanimous as to the integrity of Captain Crandall." This statement is corroborated by several other witnesses. No evidence was offered before the committee showing, or tending to show, that Mr. Crandall had been guilty of any fraud or dishonest practice which ever came to the knowledge of Mr. CONKLING; and the inquiry in this particular was confined to that limit. The committee are of opinion that the evidence does not show that Mr. CONKLING was guilty of any impropriety in recommending the restoration of Captain Crandall after Major Luddington's report, but, on the contrary it does appear that his action was limited to a simple expression of opinion, which opinion was concurred in very generally by the citizens of that district, and supported by the report of the detective selected by General Fry to investigate the acts of Captain Crandall. It has not been shown to the committee that General Fry or any other person believed that Captain Crandall should have been prosecuted. Mr. Dana testifies to the statement of General Fry that he knew nothing which Captain Crandall had done or omitted which he should not have done or omitted. General Fry, in his letter of November 6, published in the Globe, says that Captain Crandall was suspended from duty for refusing to turn over the $20,000 bonds to a disbursing officer, an act for which he deserved no censure, in the opinion of the committee, for the reasons herein stated. The letter of General Fry to Mr. BLAINE states that Captain Crandall was discharged on the recommendation of Major Luddington, who reported that though not legally guilty he had morally perpetrated a most glaring and inexcusable fraud on the Government he was sworn to serve. The committee have not found in the evidence before them any evidence of such moral fraud on the part of Captain Crandall, and certainly no facts had been shown to be within the knowledge of Mr. CONKLING, in relation to Captain Crandall, which would have rendered it improper for Mr. CONKLING to have recommended his restoration to office.

An attempt was made to show, by the testimony of Patrick J. Kinney, that when Aaron Richardson was arrested at Utica he was set at liberty by the officers having him in custody, after an interview which he had at his own request with Mr. CONKLING. In relation to this matter it is only necessary to say that Mr. Richardson had made important disclosures to the Government; was a witness in the prosecution of Haddock; that the acts of Mr. CONKLING in relation to the witness were fully known to and approved by the Secretary of War.

In relation to the third specification above stated, the facts are as follows:

Captain Crandall required Aaron Richardson, a bounty broker, to deposit security with him that certain men furnished by said Richardson, and enlisted, should go forward to the front and be there received, and the sum of $20,000 in bonds of Oneida county was deposited as such security. Some men that were furnished by Richardson refused to receive any local bounty whatever, insisting that all they claimed or desired was the bounty that Government paid others; they took fifty dollars and would take no more. In all of those cases the right of the recruit to receive the local bounty was fully explained to him by Captain Crandall. But as a precaution against desertion, Captain Crandall required Richardson to deposit $500 for each man, as security for receipt of the recruit at the general rendezvous.

After depositing the bonds, Richardson claimed that Provost Marshal Crandall had no legal authority to require security for the appearance of the recruit, and demanded that the bonds should be refunded to him. Of the men furnished by Richardson, thirty-one deserted before reaching the front, seven of whom were retaken.

These bonds were not "local bounty," nor were they "deposited in behalf of recruits," as stated in General Fry's letter. They either belonged to Richardson, who deposited them, or to the Government, for whose security they were deposited. Hon. Ward Hunt testifies that "about $13,000 would have been forfeited under the contract, about that amount of men having deserted. About $7,000 no one would have any claim to as against Aaron Richardson."

On the 4th of March, 1865, Major Haddock directed Captain Crandall to turn over those bonds to S. Floyd Hoard, special agent. Captain Crandall sought the advice of distinguished and able counsel, and was told he could not safely turn over these bonds to Major Haddock without risk of being held personally responsible for the amount; and it also appears that Captain Crandall and his advisers had grave apprehensions, since shown to have been well founded, that it would be unsafe to have placed the bonds in the possession of Major Haddock. After taking counsel on the 11th of March, Captain Crandall stated the whole matter in relation to those bonds fully in a letter to General Fry, and asks General Fry to advise him what to do, as follows: "Major Haddock calls upon me to forward the money and securities to him; counsel of high standing advise me that I cannot safely do so, but that I am responsible to the parties entitled to it. The money and securities are now on hand, and I wish nothing so much as to pay them over. Can I safely pay this money to Major Haddock, and will the Government protect me against the persons who claim it? Be pleased to instruct me on this point."

No answer was made by General Fry, so far as the committee can discover. On the 30th of March, 1865, General Fry ordered Captain Crandall to turn over to Major Lee all moneys, bonds, and other evidences of indebtedness in his possession "belonging to enlisted men" who had deserted either before or after arriving at the general rendezvous, and all moneys, bonds, and other evidences of indebtedness in his possession belonging to enlisted men other than deserters to the United States paymaster stationed at Elmira. It will be seen that this order did not include the $20,000 of bonds which were not claimed to belong to enlisted men, whether deserters or others. It does appear clearly that Captain Crandall never claimed any right to hold these bonds on his own account; that he was anxious to be rid of them, and only sought to protect himself from liability; that he deposited the bonds in a bank in Utica, and that when suit was brought against him for the bonds, he advised General Fry of the fact, stating that he had no interest in defending the suit, and asking that the Government should defend its right to the bonds. The Government never having done this, the county of Oneida has given to Captain Crandall proper security to indemnify him, and assumed the defense of the suit. These bonds belonged unquestionably either to Aaron Richardson or to the Government. If they belonged to Richardson, it is not easy to see why the complaint should be made that Captain Crandall had violated the orders of the Department in not turning over the bonds to Major Haddock or Major Lee, leaving himself liable to Richardson for this amount. If they belonged to the Government, it is still more difficult to see why the Government should not have employed counsel and protected its right to them. The defense of that suit was in no sense a defense of Captain Crandall, but simply the maintenance by the Government of its right to the bonds. Captain Crandall having been removed from office, and having no interest in the question, it seems absurd to require or expect him to defend, at his own expense, a suit which could not benefit or harm him, however it might be decided.

The committee regard the action of Mr. CONKLING, in directing the attention of the Department to the condition of this fund and the manifest danger of its loss to the Government as highly commendable. Nor have the committee been able to discover anything improper in the conduct of Captain Crandall in relation to these bonds. There is one other statement in the letter of General Fry that comes within the limit of the present investigation, (to wit, the charges against Mr. CONKLING;) that statement is as follows: "If while acting as judge advocate upon him by his friend Mr. Dana, he came into possession of any fact impugning my integrity as a public officer, he was guilty of gross public wrong and unfaithfulness if he did not instantly file formal charges against me with the Secretary of War. He can therefore only escape the charges of deliberate and malignant falsehood as a member of Congress by confessing an unpardonable breach of duty as judge advocate." No powers whatever, "extraordinary and inquisitorial" or otherwise, were bestowed upon Mr. CONKLING by Mr. Dana: whatever powers he had were given him by the Secretary of War, and not at the suggestion of Mr. Dana. Mr. CONKLING was discharging the duties of judge advocate only in the prosecution of Major Haddock. He had nothing whatever to do with filing charges against General Fry. To this point the committee cite the testimony of the Secretary of War as follows: "In the prosecution of Major Haddock to final judgment, Mr. CONKLING performed all the duty I expected him to perform;" and also the testimony of Mr. Dana, as follows: "I never knew of any authority given to Mr. CONKLING in any form, directly or indirectly, at any time, to investigate the acts of General Fry, or to file charges against him. It would have been evidently improper for him to file charges against General Fry, according to the usages of the Department."

ACCUSATIONS AS TO DOUBLE OFFICES AND IMPROPER FEES.

Another of the statements of General Fry's letter which the committee are directed to inquire into is in these words:

"For his services in this connection, Mr. CONKLING received, on the 9th of November last, from the United States the modest fee of $3,000. Whether he received, as it has been reported, from his district $5,000 more for the same service, and whether he received additional fees from guilty parties for opposing proceedings at Utica, I am unable now to say."

This is asserted in connection with and after the statement that "in the summer of 1863, Mr. CONKLING made a case for himself by telegraphing to the War Department that the provost marshal of his district required legal advice, which he was thereupon empowered to give."

The effect of this statement is an insinuation that the employment of Mr. CONKLING in this prosecution was by him improperly secured; that the amount of his compensation by the Government was excessive, and that there was some reason to believe that his district had paid him, besides the fee from the Government, for the same service, $5,000; and, besides this, that he had been compensated by guilty men for corrupt services which he had rendered them in opposing the prosecutions which he had been employed to make.

The charge is not mitigated in its severity by the fact that it only insinuates, and seeks for its author the cover of alleged report. These features only give to it the enhanced capacity for mischief which grows out of the increased difficulty of disproving what is only vaguely charged, instead of being stated with definiteness as to time, place, and circumstances. The committee can find, in all that has come to their knowledge, absolutely nothing which can furnish a pretext for that part of this charge which relates to the $5,000 and the fee from guilty parties—not even the existence of any such report as the charge alludes to. The accusation insinuated is not only utterly false in fact, false in each particular, both as to the $5,000 from the district, and that from guilty parties, but, so far as proof could be found, it was false in the most insufficient apology for its utterance, to wit, the existence of an alleged report giving it credence. No accusation can well be conceived more intensely hurtful than the last part of this one is. To say of anyone that he is sordid or voracious in his methods of getting gain, is to deny to him most of the qualities of a gentleman. To add to this that he gets money by ordinary frauds, is to exclude him from all just title to the common rights of civil and social life. To add, again, that his frauds were associated with compounding of felonies, and his gains the price of their concealment, is to stamp the accused with an ineffable infamy. But if to all this you add that he who is charged with taking the price of the suppressed crime is one of the members-elect of his Government, and as such charged with its safety; that, in addition, he had assumed special duties as to the prosecution of the very crimes for the alleged suppression of which he has taken pay; and that the crime suppressed was at least a moral treason against the Government of which he was an officer-elect, and a treason, too, committed at a time when his Government's existence was in deepest peril; when, we say, all these elements combine in the accusation, the guilt charged assumes a depth of turpitude which can hardly find a parallel. That such a charge should, without any shadow of cause, be made in any way seems almost incredible. But that it should be carefully couched in the forms of insinuation, showing timidity and solicitude in the author to avoid responsibility, and should then be written out and sent into Congress, to be read in the presence of the nation, and preserved against the accused and his children in the history of Congress, presents, as a libel, a case almost new—certainly singular—for its bad eminence as a wanton and inexcusable violation of the rights of a citizen and member of the Government.

The use that was made in the House of that part of this charge relating to the fee of $3,000 makes it due to Mr. CONKLING that it should be determined whether his being a member-elect of this House rendered it improper or illegal for him to take the employment or its compensation; and the insinuation contained in this statement that the fee was excessive renders it proper to inquire whether it was such. As to the latter point, the committee had no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that Mr. CONKLING's compensation for services rendered to the Government was a reasonable one. He had nothing to do with fixing its amount. That was left wholly to the Government. He accepted the service with reluctance, and upon the most pressing and repeated solicitations of the Secretary of War. He took it at the sacrifice of other professional business of equal value, or of perhaps greater value to him than he realized for this. He took it at a time when it was almost vital to the interests of the military service in New York that they should be rendered. The committee are of opinion that the Secretary of War rightly judged that no one could be found more eminently qualified on all accounts for the efficient discharge of that peculiar service, under the peculiar circumstances in which it was undertaken and rendered. The duties he assumed were discharged with consummate ability, and with integrity, diligence, and complete success. They went through about five months. They involved the examination of a large field of complicated facts; a labyrinth of frauds and villainies. The record of the trial makes some fifteen hundred pages of matter, and resulted not only in discovering and punishing these crimes against the Government, but also in the conviction and punishment of the acting provost marshal general of west New York, Major Haddock, and in the recovery from him of a fine of $10,000, paid into the United States Treasury, besides the further sum of over $200,000, which he was constrained to pay over after the commencement of the prosecution.

The committee have come unanimously to the conclusion that the conduct of Mr. CONKLING, in entering upon that service, and in its management throughout, was not only free from any improper, selfish, or unpatriotic motives, and from all just grounds of reproach, but his services were singularly able, faithful, and in results valuable to the Government.

THE LAW.

The only other question touching this part of the matter referred to the committee to be considered is, whether there was any legal impediment in the way of Mr. CONKLING, he being a member-elect of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, assuming the relation he did assume to the prosecution of Haddock. The committee have sought carefully to inquire whether there was any such legal impediment.

RIGHT OF DEPARTMENTS TO EMPLOY AND PAY AGENTS.

In determining upon this question, it seems perfectly safe to assume that what is said by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Gratiot vs. United States, 15 Peters, 371, is the settled law applicable to this class of cases, to wit, that "a Department charged with the execution of particular authority, business, or duty, has always been deemed incidentally to possess the right to employ the proper persons to perform the same."

"And also the right, when the service or duty is an extra service or duty, to allow the person so employed a suitable compensation." "But is fully not new," says the Supreme Court, vs. Riley, expounded in the cases of the United States vs. Billebrew, 7 Peters, 18, and the United States vs. Peters, 28. And the court adds: "That in order to be justly a refusal to allow such compensation it is indispensable to show that there is some law which positively prohibits, or by just implication denies, any allowance of such compensation." This was said by the court in a case where it was an officer of the United States who was claiming the compensation for services outside of his salary.

THE PROHIBITIONS.

We assume, then, that there is nothing in the general relations of a member-elect of Congress to the Government, nor in the general principles of the law growing out of that relation, which would forbid Mr. CONKLING becoming the agent or attorney of the Government, and receiving compensation therefor; and that if his relations to the Haddock trial were illegal it must be owing to some express provision of the Constitution or of the law. Is there any such legal prohibition? The legal provisions which have been brought to the attention of the committee, and which are supposed to have some bearing upon the question of the legality of Mr. CONKLING's relations to the Haddock trial and his compensation therefor, are the following:

1. The Constitution (article one, section six) declares that "no person holding an office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office."

2. The eighteenth section of the act of 31st August, 1852, (1 Brightly, 821) provides that "no person hereafter who holds or shall hold any office under the Government of the United States, whose salary or annual compensation shall amount to the sum of $2,500, shall receive compensation for discharging the duty of any other office."

3. The third section of the act of 3d March, 1839, (5 United States Statutes, 349, and 1 Brightly, 820,) which reads as follows: "No officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person, whose salaries, or whose pay and emoluments is or are fixed by law or regulations, shall receive any extra allowance or compensation in any form whatever for the disbursements of public money or the performance of any other service, unless the said extra allowance or compensation be authorized by law."

4. The second section of the act of 23d August, 1842, (5 United States Statutes, 510, and 1 Brightly, 820,) which reads as follows: "No officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person, whose salary, pay, or emoluments is or are fixed by law or regulations, shall receive any additional pay, extra allowance or compensation in any form whatever for the disbursements of public money or other service or duty whatever, unless the same shall be authorized by law, and the appropriation therefor explicitly set forth that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation."

5. The twelfth section of the act of 26th August, 1842, (1 Brightly, 821, 5 United States Statutes, 525,) which reads as follows: "No allowance or compensation shall be made to any clerk or other officer by reason of the discharge of the duties which belong to any other clerk or officer in the same or any other Department; and no allowance or compensation shall be made for any extra service whatever which any clerk or other officer may be required to perform."

6. The first section of the act of 30th September, 1850, (1 Brightly, 821, 9 United States Statutes, 542,) which reads as follows: "The proper accounting officer of the Treasury, or other pay officers of the United States, shall in no case allow or pay to one individual the salaries of two different offices on account of having performed the duties thereof at the same time. But this prohibition shall not extend to the superintendents of the public buildings."

7. The first section of the act of April 21, 1808, (1 Brightly, 190, and 2 United States Statutes, 484,) which reads as follows: "No member of Congress shall, directly or indirectly, himself, or by any other person whatsoever in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in whole or in part, any contract or agreement hereafter to be made or entered into with any officer of the United States in their behalf, or with any person authorized to make contracts on the part of the United States; and if any member of Congress shall, directly or indirectly, himself, or by any other person whatsoever in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, enter into, accept, or agree for or undertake or execute any such contract or agreement, in whole or in part, every member so offending shall, for every such offense, upon conviction thereof before any court of the United States or the Territories thereof having cognizance of such offense, be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined $3,000; and every such contract or agreement as aforesaid shall moreover be absolutely void and of no effect."

8. The first section of the act of June 11, 1864, (2 Brightly, 105, and 13 United States Statutes, 123,) which reads as follows: "No member of the Senate or House of Representatives shall, after his election and during his continuance in office, nor shall any head of a Department, head of a bureau, clerk, or other officer of the Government, receive or agree to receive any compensation whatsoever, directly or indirectly, for any services rendered or to be rendered, after the passage of this act, to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party, or directly or indirectly interested, before any Department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever; and any person offending against the provisions of this act shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years at the discretion of the court trying the same, and shall be forever thereafter incapable of holding any office of honor or trust or profit under the Government of the United States."

THE CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITION.

These are all of the existing laws which have come to the attention of the committee, and which are supposed to contain anything bearing, either nearly or remotely, upon the matter of this service of Mr. CONKLING being prohibited by law. There are other laws which bear upon other points in this inquiry, which will be alluded to.

With these provisions of the Constitution and law before us, and assuming as law that which we have above stated from the case of Gratiet vs. The United States, (15, Peters, 371,) we inquire whether any of these provisions of express law do away with that general principle as applicable to the matter before the committee; or whether either of these provisions prohibit or render illegal what was done by Mr. CONKLING in the Haddock trial, he being a member-elect of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

To avoid, if we can, confusion, we first consider this without reference to the question whether Mr. CONKLING should be paid, as a member of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, for the same time covered by his service in the Haddock trial, and for which time it is suggested he was paid by the fee of $3,000, and let the inquiry be first disposed of whether it was illegal for Mr. CONKLING to assume that service and to take compensation therefor.

And, in disposing of this inquiry, let it first be granted that Mr. CONKLING, in what occurred in that service, became and was a "judge advocate," in the strictest sense, and that he was thereby made an officer of the United States, and was not a mere agent and counsel of the Government.

In entering upon this inquiry the committee do not forget the truth nor the supreme importance of that principle of our Government which was pressed upon the attention of the committee in the argument of this case, and which received, during the Thirty-Eighth Congress, the sanction of this House, in its approval of the report in the cases of ROBERT C. SCHENCK and of Francis P. Blair. The principle to which we allude is thus stated in that report:

"Nothing is plainer in the theory and plan of this Government than the distinct and separate organization of the executive, judicial, and legislative departments, and the sedulous care with which each has been clothed and guarded in the exercise of duties entirely independent of the others. Yet the attempt to invest the same person with two offices, one legislative and the other executive, and require of him at the same time the discharge of the duties of both, is, whether they be conflicting or not, a commingling of the duties of the executive and legislative departments. It is bringing the Executive himself into the very Halls of Congress, and if persisted in, might ultimately prove as pernicious as he had a seat therein, and as many votes as he had commissions. If one Representative in Congress may at the same time hold under the Executive the office of major general, so may another, and another may as well be a brigadier general, or hold any other official position in the military service under the Executive and Commander-in-Chief, and bound to obey him. By such process the House may at any time be put under the control and become the pliant instrument of the Executive to any end. Its members would cease to be the Representatives of the people, and become only the agents of the Executive."

The framers of the Constitution saw this so clearly, and felt the independence of the legislative over the executive department was so essential and vital that they deemed the inhibition worthy of an express constitutional enactment, that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." (Art. 1, sec. vi.)

Still, in view of this important principle, the committee have not been able to see how the acceptance and discharge of the duties of the office of judge advocate by Mr. CONKLING, the duties, tenure, and existence of which office (if such it was in him) were in their nature such as would most likely be, and were in fact, wholly ended and gone before he was, by law or the Constitution, required to qualify as a member of Congress, or to enter upon, assume, or discharge any duty as such, conflicted with these principles. Upon this subject-matter the committee deem the following two propositions to be entirely settled in our Government: 1. "The acceptance by a member of any office under the United States, after he has been elected to, and has taken his seat in Congress, operates as a forfeiture of his seat." (See Van Ness case, Cl. and Hall, 122; Schenck and Blair case, Thirty-Eighth Congress, &c.) 2. "Continuing to execute the duties of an office under the United States after one is elected to Congress, but before he takes his seat, is not a disqualification, such office being resigned or extinct prior to the taking of the seat." (See Hammond vs. Herriek, Cl. and Hall, 287; Earl's case, ibid., 314; Munford's case, ibid., 316; Schenck and Blair's case, Thirty-Eighth Congress, &c.)

The committee agree with the reasoning and conclusions of the report, from which we have already quoted, that the continuance to hold another office after the time when the law and the Constitution requires the member-elect to qualify and enter upon the discharge of his duties as a member, is, in legal contemplation, an act of election by him to vacate his office as a member; and such continuance to hold the other office is equivalent in its legal significance to the act of accepting and entering upon an office tendered after the member was qualified. Both alike vacate the legislative office. The act, therefore, of Mr. CONKLING in accepting an office not previously held, which from its nature would terminate before he would be required to assume any duty as a member, had no more nor less effect in depriving him of his right to enter upon his office as a member of Congress than the act of continuing after he was elected to exercise the duties of an office which he had previously entered upon would have. Neither operates to vacate his seat in this House, the first office being such as must be and was wholly ended or abandoned before the time comes when he is required to enter upon his duties as a legislator. The act of acceptance of such a temporary office at such a time did not in its nature indicate any election or purpose to abandon or resign the membership in Congress. "The object of the constitutional prohibition upon an officer becoming a member of Congress is attained, so far as it can be by this provision, if the inhibition attaches the moment the member enters upon the discharge of his duties as such, and nothing is gained by an earlier application of it." There was, therefore, no constitutional objection to Mr. CONKLING's accepting this office of judge advocate, if he did become such officer.

PROHIBITORY STATUTES.

The acts of Congress above referred to, of the dates respectively of March 3, 1839, and of the 23d and 26th of August, 1842, are, as is said by the Attorney General of the United States, (5 Opins., 768,) "the same in their sense and meaning;" and as to all of these acts, including that of September 30, 1850, above cited, he says, "they do not forbid a person from holding two compatible offices at the same time. They were intended to prevent arbitrary extra allowances in each particular case, but do not apply to distinct employments with salaries affixed to each by law or regulations." (See also 6 Opins., 80 and 325.)

If the committee were left to their own construction of these statutes of 1839, 1842, and 1850, we would have attained the same conclusion to which the Attorney General arrived in these opinions. But when there is added to the force of these and several other equivalent opinions by the Attorney Generals of this Government, the weight of the fact that all these statutes were in force when most of the very numerous decisions by this House were made, determining that there was nothing either illegal or unconstitutional in a member of Congress elect (but not qualified) holding an office under the United States Government, provided he did not hold it after the time came when the Constitution required him to assume his duties as a legislator, the committee could not hesitate in coming to the conclusion that neither the Constitution nor either of these statutes alluded to in the opinion of the Attorney General were violated when Mr. CONKLING became (if he did) special judge advocate, and took compensation therefor. We say "took compensation therefor," because in all the cases we have cited the member-elect, as the committee understand the history of the cases, received his compensation for his first office during the time he held it, but not his compensation as a member for the same time.

THE STATUTE AGAINST JOBBING.

Although not quite in proper order, it may perhaps as well be said here as anywhere else, that the committee do not see what the statute of April 21, 1808, has to do with this inquiry. That act renders it a crime for any member of Congress to "undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in whole or in part, any contract or agreement, hereafter to be made or entered into, with any officer of the United States, in their behalf, or with any person authorized to make contracts on the part of the United States." No "contract" or "agreement" has been proved in this case between Mr. CONKLING and any other person, coming within what is the obvious meaning of these words in the act of 1808. The design of that statute is what is expressed by the Attorney General of the United States (4 Opinions, 48) when he says, "The object of the statute is only to prevent jobbing between members of the Legislature and the Executive for the primary advantage of the former." Surely the practice which has been general and uninterrupted, as must be within the personal knowledge of every intelligent citizen, of members of Congress acting as the attorneys of their Government, has not subjected all such attorneys to indictment and fine of $5,000. No one has suggested that such is the law, and the committee would have made no allusion to it but for the fact that it is presented to our consideration in the brief of Mr. CONKLING.

THE ACT PROHIBITING MEMBERS BECOMING CLAIM AGENTS, ETC.

The act of June 11, 1864, cited above, renders it a high crime for any member of Congress, at any time after his election, "to receive or agree to receive any compensation for any services rendered to any person in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party, or interested directly or indirectly, before any Department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commissioner whatever."

This statute would have been directly in point had Mr. CONKLING received compensation for being the counsel for Haddock in this court-martial. The fact that this recent statute, passed in full and thoroughly intelligent view of all the important questions of law, which your committee is required to consider, carefully confines its prohibitions to preventing members-elect from taking compensation for services rendered before courts-martial, &c., "to any person" and against the Government, and does not prohibit such compensation being paid by the Government, nor prohibit such service being rendered in its favor; and this, too, in the identical case before the committee, is one of the strongest possible legislative determinations of the very question we consider. Here is a law which comes up squarely, face to face, in front of that exact question we consider, to wit, whether a member-elect to Congress ought to be permitted to receive compensation for services rendered to either of the parties to a trial before a court-martial. And the Congress said it should not be lawful for him to take compensation for services rendered to one side—"any person"—and now shall we be told that Congress meant to declare that it was equally illegal to take compensation for services rendered to the other side, to wit, for services in favor of the United States. On the other hand, is this not a conclusive legislative determination that a member-elect might be compensated for services rendered to that other non-prohibited side of the case? It so seems to the committee.

ACT OF 1852.

This disposes of the alleged legal prohibitions upon Mr. CONKLING's entering upon the service, unless it be, (and we think including,) that supposed to be, contained in the eighteenth section of the act of 21st July, 1852, already cited, (1 Brightly, 821,) and which is as follows: "No person hereafter who holds or shall hold any office under the Government of the United States, whose salary or annual compensation shall amount to the sum of $2,500, shall receive compensation for discharging the duties of any other office."

It was suggested in the debates in the House, and earnestly urged elsewhere, that this section, even if it did not render Mr. CONKLING's services upon the Haddock trial illegal, does render it illegal for him to receive compensation for his services upon that trial. The committee is not quite certain that the order of the House directing it to inquire into the charges against Mr. CONKLING contained in the letter of General Fry to Mr. BLAINE admits of the committee's examining the question whether Mr. CONKLING was entitled to take that compensation of $3,000. That letter does not charge that the taking of any fee was illegal, but only insinuates that it was excessive. Still, after what occurred touching this double compensation in the debates of the House, the committee deem it proper to examine this question also. If it be outside of the duties of the committee, an easy way of preventing mischief from this part of the report will be to disregard it.

The determination of the question whether this act of 1852 renders it illegal for Mr. CONKLING to receive, in addition to his salary as a member of Congress, this $3,000, requires the committee to determine one or more of the following questions:

1. Is one who has been elected to Congress, but who has not yet taken the oath of office, nor in any way entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office, and prior to the time when, by law, he is required to enter upon these duties, "a person who holds any office?"

2. Granting that he is, in the case stated in the preceding question, a person holding an office, then does he hold an office "under the Government of the United States," within this just sense of this section?

3. If he, as a member-elect, is an officer "under the Government of the United States," then did Mr. CONKLING, in what he did in the Haddock service, become an officer of the United States?

4. If he did not become an officer of the United States, did he, in that Haddock trial, discharge "the duties of any other office," and receive compensation therefor?

IS A MEMBER-ELECT ONE HOLDING OFFICE?

The first of these inquiries is, in the judgment of the committee, answered so far as is necessary in deciding upon the effect of the act of 1852, by the cases of Hammond, of Earl, of Munford, of Schenck, and others, which we have already cited. These cases, as we have seen, all determine that, prior to the time when the Constitution requires the member-elect to commence the duties of his legislative office, and before he has assumed these duties and taken the oath of office, he may receive compensation for discharging the duties of another office. As we have already said, those cases do not determine that he may also be compensated as a member of Congress for the same time for which he was compensated in the other office. But they do determine that being a member-elect of Congress does not make him an "officer" in such sense as to bring him within the prohibition of the act of 1852. This question, in substance, received the careful attention of the House in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, upon an able report of one of its committees. The committee and House came to what your committee deem a just conclusion, when it determined that one merely elected to Congress, but who had not entered upon his duties nor been qualified, was not a member of this House, that is, did not hold an office so as to prevent him from continuing to hold another office and receive compensation therefor. The committee, in concluding their argument showing that one merely elected to Congress was not a member of the House, and not, as such, amenable to its jurisdiction, says: "The committee are not aware of any attempt to punish a Representative-elect, and of but one instance of an attempt to expel one. A resolution was adopted by the last House, under the previous question, to expel a person who was a Representative-elect, but had never signified his acceptance of the office, nor qualified, nor even appeared in Washington for the purpose of taking his seat."

In that case the House determined, in effect, that the act of 1852 did not prohibit General SCHENCK, while a member-elect of Congress from receiving the pay of another office, to wit, that of major general of volunteers.

This is the last case in which the question came before the House. But the same question received in the Fifteenth Congress, in the case of Hammond vs. Herriek, (Clark and Hall, Contested Elections, 233, 291,) a still more elaborate and exhaustive consideration. In the report in that case (which also received the sanction of the House) this doctrine was explicitly stated, and was affirmed after a thorough review of the English and American cases touching it. The case held the rule which was stated by the committee in these words: "Neither do election and return constitute membership."

"Our rule in this particular is different from that of the House of Commons. It is also better, for it makes our theory conform to what is fact in both countries—that the act of becoming in reality a member of the House depends wholly upon the person elected and returned. Election does not of itself constitute membership, although the period may arrive at which the congressional term commences."

This House has again and again determined that men elected to it who do not appear in the body and assume the constitutional oath of office, are not to be reckoned as members of the House in determining the number required to make a majority or quorum of the body.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE, ETC.

The committee, in coming to this conclusion, have not overlooked the fact that members-elect, but not qualified, are by the laws accorded certain privileges and salary. The effect of this right to enjoy these privileges before becoming qualified as a member of the legislative body has received the fullest attention both in this House and in the English Parliament. The result attained is, that these special privileges are not necessarily indicia of actual official authority or station, and may by law as well be attached to one's person before and after he is an officer as during his official tenure. The Representatives after the expiration of their terms, the Presidents of the United States after such expiration, and the widows of certain ex-Presidents, all have the franking privilege, and these are not then officers of the Government in any sense. The assumption of office in this country, as well as its relinquishment, is voluntary, and one elected to Congress is at perfect liberty to refuse to assume the office. His exercise of the franking privilege, with the knowledge that he never would enter upon the duties of the office, would be an act of bad faith towards his Government; but that would not render him a member of Congress, nor would the exercise prevent him, should failure of health or other cause render it improper to enter upon his office, from rightly refusing ever to take the office.

Other and perhaps more conclusive considerations bearing upon this important inquiry might be given, but it is not deemed best to pursue it further. The committee are entirely satisfied that the law of this House is fully and rightly settled as to this point, and that he is not a member of Congress, nor one who "holds any office under the Government of the United States," who has only been elected to this House, but who has never taken any oath of office nor entered upon the duties of that position.

Mr. CONKLING was not prohibited by the act of 1852 from receiving compensation as he did for his services in the Haddock trial, even if his duties on that trial were official. We have not yet reached the question of his right to be also paid his salary as a member of this House for the same time covered by the Haddock service.

IS AN ACTING MEMBER OF CONGRESS AN OFFICER OF OR UNDER THE GOVERNMENT?

The next proposition the committee were called to consider and decide is thus stated by Mr. CONKLING: "A Representative in Congress is not at all within the words 'person who holds an office under the Government of the United States.' Senators and Representatives do not hold offices under the Government of the United States. They are part of the Government, and therefore not affected one way or the other by these provisions."

If the committee were sustained in the views they have taken of other propositions in this inquiry, then the consideration of this one would not be necessary to the determination of what is before the committee. But as the committee may not be sustained in the other propositions which dispose of the case, they have felt impelled carefully to consider this one.

The proposition that a member of Congress who has been sworn into office is not an officer under the Government of the United States, within the sense of the act of 1852, is supported by an appeal to authorities expounding the sense of these words as used in the Constitution.

These or similar words are found in the Constitution in the following clauses:

1. That prohibiting Senators and Representatives during the term for which they are elected from being appointed to "any civil office under the authority of the United States, which was created or its emoluments increased during such time."

2. That prohibiting a person "holding any office under the United States from being a member of either House of Congress."

3. That giving Congress the power to make all laws necessary to carry into effect the powers vested by the Constitution in "any officer of the Government of the United States."

4. That prohibiting every "person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States from accepting any present, office, &c., from any king, prince, or foreign State, without the consent of Congress."

5. That prohibiting every Senator, Representative, and person "holding an office of trust or profit under the United States" from being appointed an elector for President, &c.

6. That providing that the President shall commission "all officers of the United States."

7. That providing that "all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment."

8. That prohibiting any one who has suffered a judgment of impeachment from holding or enjoying "any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States."

The proposition stated, and which the committee are asked to affirm, is, that a member of Congress and his office are not included in the scope or meaning of the words of the Constitution "officer under the United States," or "civil office under the authority of the United States." It is said that he is part of the Government, and is not under it. It seems to be indicated that he may, in the sense of the Constitution, be an officer of the Government, but not under the Government. In the impeachment of Blount (Wharton's State Trials, 268, &c.) this argument is presented by Mr. Bayard, but he (p. 269) makes the very proper remark as to such an argument that he was "unwilling to place any confidence upon an argument derived from mere verbal criticism. In construing the charter of a Government our views should comprehend all its parts, and our aim should be to execute it according to its general and true design." No method of attaining the sense of the Constitution is more unsafe than this one of "sticking" in sharp verbal criticism. But a little consideration of this matter will show that "officers of" and "officers under" the United States are (as said by Mr. Dallas in this Blount case, p. 277) "indiscriminately used in the Constitution." Take that clause as to who may be impeached. The Constitution says that "the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." Now, then, if officers of the United States do not include officers under the United States, (that is, officers appointed by the President, such as judges, &c.,) then you cannot impeach anybody except the President, Vice President, and, perhaps, the members of Congress, if the latter are to be deemed officers of the Government. Again: the judgment of impeachment disqualifies the convict from holding "any office of trust or profit under the United States," and not from holding the offices of the United States. You can only impeach them who are officers of the United States, and then, when impeached, they are only prohibited from holding offices under the United States—that is, they can hold the same offices from which they were excluded by impeachment, but cannot hold the inferior executive offices under those from which the impeachment does not perpetually exclude them.

Again: the Constitution provides that "the President shall appoint all officers of the United States." Are not the judges, ministers, heads of Departments, postmasters, &c., officers under the United States? If so, they are also officers of the United States, because the Constitution only authorizes him to appoint officers of the United States.

It is irresistibly evident that no argument can be based on the different sense of the words "of" and "under," as used in these clauses of the Constitution, and we must approach this question as to whether a member of Congress is an officer "under" the United States, with the knowledge that if we find him to be either an officer "of" the United States, or one "under" the Government of the United States, in either case he has been brought within the constitutional meaning of these words, as used in the act of 1852, because they are made by the Constitution equivalent and interchangeable.

All we have to do, therefore, is to find out whether the Constitution anywhere (not everywhere) uses these expressions "officers of" or "officers under the United States" in such sense as must include members of Congress. If the Constitution once so uses either of these equivalent expressions, then all argument as to the sense of these words in the act of 1852, so far as that argument is derived from their meaning in the Constitution, is destroyed, because if the Constitution once uses these words in a sense which includes members of Congress, then so may the act of 1852 so use them.

Now, let us see whether there is any clause where one or other of these phrases "officers of" or "officers under the Government of the United States" must include members of Congress.

Take the clause above cited as to receiving presents, &c., from any king, &c. There the prohibition is that "no person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States shall," &c. Now, will it do to hold that a clerk in the post office shall not be permitted to receive offices, &c., from a king, &c., without the assent of Congress, and yet every member of the Senate or of the House be permitted to be "plied," in the interests of a foreign Government, with bribes, in the shape of presents, offices, emoluments, and titles? May the King of England make the American Senate a British House of Lords? He may, unless the position of a Senator and Representative is an "officer under the United States," because there is no other clause prohibiting such bestowals! Again, take the clause containing the requirement that no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States. Now, shall it be held that a member of Congress may be required to have some religion, or a particular religion, by the establishment of a religious test as to his office, and yet all the other offices of the Government be kept open to the infidel? And yet this is the law of the Government, unless a member of Congress be one holding an office or public trust under the United States; for there is no other prohibition than this one upon requiring such religious tests.

Or take the clause, already cited, as to the effect of judgments of impeachment. If a member of Congress does not hold any office of trust or profit under the United States, then he is in an office into which one may immediately and freely enter who has, by impeachment, just been convicted of treason, bribery, or other high crime. This is because that the only places into which an impeached felon cannot enter are "offices of honor, trust, or profit under the United States." The convicted traitor cannot enter into the office of "deputy United States assessor of internal revenue," but he may become United States Senator!

We might increase these examples, but surely it is not necessary. Surely it cannot be that the Constitution contains elements so repugnant to all just or safe principles of government.

But we are referred to authorities to establish this proposition that a member of Congress is not an officer "of" or "under" the United States; and the leading case relied on is the impeachment of William Blount, a United States Senator from Tennessee. The case is found fully reported in Wharton's State Trials, 250. Justice Story (1 Constitution, section 793) says this case decides that a United States Senator is not a civil officer of the United States. This remark of the learned author is obviously an incautious one, and not fully authorized by what occurred in that case. The same author in the same section expressly declares that the "reasoning by which the decision was sustained does not appear, the deliberations having been private." He adds that "it was probably held that civil officers of the United States" meant such as derived their appointment from and under the national Government," &c. The defenses of Mr. Blount (see page 260) were various. His main ones were: first, that the offenses charged were cognizable in the civil courts and not on impeachment, they not relating to his official duties; second, that he had been expelled from the Senate before the trial of the impeachment, and that he was therefore not an officer of the United States and not amenable to the Senate.

As to what this case does decide, Wharton (page 317) justly says: "In a legal point of view, all that this case decides is that a Senator of the United States who has been expelled from his seat is not, after such expulsion, subject to impeachment; and perhaps from this the broader proposition may be drawn that none are liable to impeachment except officers of the Government in the technical sense, excluding thereby members of the national Legislature."

Judge Story further says of this decision that it was one on "which the Senate was greatly divided," (14 to 11), and which "seems not to have been quite satisfactory to the minds of some learned commentators." (4 Tuck. Black. Com. App., 57, 58; Rawle on Const., ch. 22, pp. 213, 214, 218, 219.)

Without, therefore, designing to determine that the case of Blount did not decide that a member of Congress was not a civil officer of the United States "in some technical sense," the committee are wholly unable to come to the conclusion that the members of the national Congress are not, in the enlarged and general sense of the Constitution, officers of their Government. The committee do not believe that any authority is to be found holding that they are not. It by no means follows, because a member of Congress may not be tried by impeachment, that he is not a "civil officer of the United States" in the sense we now consider. There are other clauses and principles of the Constitution which affect the question or the right to impeach a Senator besides that single one as to who are included in the just sense of the words "civil officers of the United States." Such is that one providing a method for the expulsion of members; also those as to the separate and independent action of the two Houses touching their own members, &c. These and like considerations may well be held to control and qualify the words of the Constitution as to who may be impeached. No one can read the singularly able and exhaustive argument in the case of Blount and not realize that the other principles and terms of the Constitution ought to and did control the sense of the words "all civil officers of the United States" as used in this clause. The committee decline to find that an acting member of Congress is not an officer of this Government within the sense of at least some of the clauses of the Constitution. The committee here leave this important question made in this case. The effort of the committee, so far as this single point is concerned, has been to bring to the attention of the House the leading considerations which must form the basis of its determination by the House, should its determination be found necessary. In the opinion of the committee, the determination of this point is not necessary to the right determination of all that is before the committee, and this is not, perhaps, a proper case in which to make a precedent upon so vital a constitutional question.

ACT OF 1852 INCLUDES ACTING MEMBERS IN THE WORD "OFFICE."

But suppose it be granted that the constitutional sense of the words "officer of the United States" or "office under the United States" be what is insisted by Mr. CONKLING, does it follow that they are used in so limited a sense in the act of 1852? Having regard to the mischief meant to be prevented by it, the committee have been wholly unable to find adequate reasons why a member of Congress who has taken his seat should not be deemed an officer "of" or "under" the Government in such sense as that he should not be permitted to draw the salaries of two offices at the same time, though holding but one. To hold that a member of Congress is as free as other men from human infirmities, and as little liable to fall into temptation, is, probably, according to him as high a grade of virtue as would be accorded to him either by the truth or by the judgment of his fellow-men. But if you look to the nature and powers of his office, and the absolutely vital importance of having him removed as far as possible from the bad influences of corruption and avarice, such as he would be liable to encounter, could he become entitled to the pay of many offices at the same time, the propriety of holding that this act of 1852 meant to preclude members of Congress from receiving double salaries becomes quite irresistible. We therefore conclude that whatever may be the meaning of the words "office under the United States," as used in the Constitution, they, in the act of 1852, ought to be held to, and do, preclude an acting member of Congress from receiving compensation for the duties of any other office.

WAS MR. CONKLING, AS ACTING JUDGE ADVOCATE, AN OFFICER?

We are now brought to the question whether Mr. CONKLING, in what occurred in this prosecution of Haddock, became an officer of the United States. That he did not we think is most readily ascertained. An office is a particular duty, charge, or trust, conferred by public authority, and for a public purpose, with a right usually attached to receive a fixed compensation for such service. Nothing can be plainer than that no office of this Government can be created or conferred except by some public authority authorized by law to confer it. Upon this very question Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Maurice (2 Brock., 101.) says: "It is too clear, I think, for controversy, that appointments to office can be made by heads of Departments in those cases only which Congress has authorized by law; and I know of no law which authorizes the Secretary of War to make his appointment." And in that case it was decided that Maurice did not become an officer, and that his contract with the Government, on which the suit was brought, was good only by reason of the fact that the United States is a Government, and as such can, at common law, make a valid contract with its agents as to matters of Government.

The Constitution (article two, section two, clause two) provides that "the President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint" * * * "all officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments." This clause covers every possible office under or in the Government. Aside from the President, Vice President, and members of Congress (these being the officers included under the above words, "appointment herein provided for") there are but three repositories in which can be placed the power to bestow any office, to wit, the President, (the Senate assenting,) the courts of law, and the heads of Departments. There was in April, 1865, no law giving to any court or any head of any Department any power whatever to confer upon any person any office of general or special judge advocate as an officer of the Government.

The sixth section of the act of July 17, 1862, (2 Brightly, 25,) authorizing the President, with the assent of the Senate, to appoint a judge advocate, with rank and pay of a major of cavalry for each army; and the sixth section of the act of June 20, 1864, (2 Brightly, 26,) authorizing the President, with assent of Senate, to appoint a Judge Advocate General, with rank of brigadier general, and an assistant, with rank of colonel of cavalry, are the only laws then in force, so far as the committee find, permitting the appointment of any judge advocate as such. Counsel in their briefs have treated the forty-ninth section of the Articles of War of April 10, 1806, (1 Brightly, 79,) as being also in force, which the committee assume, on their authority, it was. This last permitted the judge advocate or the general or officer commanding the army, detachment, or garrison, to "depute some person to prosecute in the name of the United States" military offenses. If there are any other laws bearing upon these appointments they have escaped the attention of the committee. The same section last named provides that "the judge advocate, or person officiating as such," shall take a certain oath to keep secret the doings of the court. (1 Brightly, 86.) The twenty-fifth section of the act of 3d March, 1863, (2 Brightly, 26,) authorizes the judge advocate to issue process for witnesses. This oath and these duties Mr. CONKLING took and performed in the Haddock trial. He had no other appointment or commission than that shown by the letters of April 3 by Mr. Dana, set forth in the letter of General Fry to Mr. BLAINE. He was not required to, nor did he, take the usual oath of all officers of the United States, nor did he take the oath required by the act of July 2, 1862. (2 Brightly, 348.) Without taking that oath he could not enter upon or take compensation for the duties of any office whatever, except the office of President. There is no law anywhere authorizing Mr. Stanton to appoint any one to the office of judge advocate. In the letter of Mr. Dana above quoted, it was said that "the Judge Advocate General will be instructed to issue to you an appointment as special judge advocate for the prosecution of any cases that may be brought to trial before a military tribunal." But even this was not done. Under this state of law and fact the committee do not think that Mr. CONKLING either did or could become an "officer" of the United States. Under these laws a judge advocate or a general or officer might, under the Constitution, "depute" Mr. CONKLING agent, but could not give him an office, because the Constitution does not permit these men to be authorized to appoint to office.

"DUTIES OF ANY OTHER OFFICE."

The only remaining question is, whether his being paid $3,000 for five months' service, from April 3, 1865, was such a compensation for "discharging the duties of any other office" as to require Mr. CONKLING, in justice or legal propriety, to either pay back what he has received for those services or else not to draw his salary as a member of Congress for that time.

The committee submit to the House the following propositions as conclusions at which they have arrived as to this point:

1. When a member-elect has drawn the salary or pay for any other office, for any time after the 4th of March preceding his entering upon his duties as a member of Congress, he should not receive any compensation as a member of Congress for that same time.

2. The act of 31st August, 1852, (1 Brightly, 821,) which is relied on as prohibiting Mr. CONKLING from receiving the $3,000, does not apply to "duties" or services for which there was no officer provided by law whose duty it was to discharge them, and which duties were, in their nature and in law, such that "some other person" than an officer might legally discharge them.

3. The duties discharged by Mr. CONKLING were duties for the doing of which the law had not provided, nor paid any other officer, and charged such officer, as part of his official duty at that time and place, to enter upon and do. But, on the other hand, they are services which, in their nature and under existing law, (1 Brightly, 79 and 80,) some other person than a judge advocate could do. The law expressly permitted some person not a judge advocate, and "deputed by him," and "officiating as such," to discharge them.

4. The law, or military regulations in pursuance of law, may confer upon private individuals, not officers, powers similar to those usually exercised by officers, such as that of issuing subpoenas, swearing witnesses, &c. Such is common in regulations touching elections, special commissions, the duties in some of the States of attorneys, of grand jurors, and the like. These conferments of such temporary or limited powers do not, in the sense of the Constitution and laws of the United States, necessarily constitute the recipients of them "officers," nor make their duties those of "any office."

5. Mr. CONKLING's services in the Haddock trial were not "the duties of any other office," within the meaning of the act of 1852; and he was entitled to compensation therefor the same as for any private service rendered by him in his profession. His having, therefore, received this money as the ordinary earnings of his profession, its receipt no more requires him to decline to draw his salary for that time than the collection of any of his other earnings during that time requires it.

THE ANIMUS OF THE BLAINE LETTER.

In the month of February, A. D. 1865, General Fry entered into an arrangement with Colonel L. C. Baker, chief of the United States detective force, and the firm of Allen, Riley & Hughes, then notorious bounty brokers in the city of New York, having for its object the arrest of bounty-jumpers and deserters who then, as was supposed, infested the vicinity of that city. The arrangement was first made between Colonel Baker and Allen, Riley & Hughes, in the city of New York, but subsequently the plan was communicated to General Fry, and by him approved.

The plan was as follows: Lieutenant Colonel Ilges, of the fourteenth United States infantry, was to be detailed, with orders to open an enrolling and enlisting office at Hoboken, New Jersey. Facilities were to be given all the known bounty-jumpers and deserters in the vicinity to enlist and desert with impunity until the facility for such desertion should become known to all other bounty-jumpers in the neighborhood, which was supposed to be a sufficient inducement to secure, upon a day fixed, the enrollment and enlistment of a large number, who were to be arrested by a detachment of United States soldiers to be detailed for that purpose.

By a general order of the War Department at that time the head of each board of enrollment was required to detain and hold in his hands the local bounty allowed to each recruit, which, at this point, was $300. The object of this was to secure the arrival of the recruit at the point of rendezvous, at which time the money was to be paid to the recruit. Messrs. Allen, Riley & Hughes were to provide all the cash necessary for this purpose. In consideration of such advancements, and the effect the enterprise might have upon the subsequent business of Allen, Riley & Hughes, all bounty-jumpers and deserters enlisted were credited regularly upon the books of the office, certificates of regular enlistments were made and signed by the proper officer of the board, and the same delivered to said Allen, Riley & Hughes, who were allowed to sell them to persons desiring substitutes, or to the authorities of towns, cities, or counties in the vicinity; and when such certificates were thus sold, such person or corporation was accredited therewith as though such enlistment had been made in good faith.

On the last day of March, 1865, in pursuance of the foregoing arrangements, Colonel Ilges opened an office at Hoboken and commenced taking recruits. On the 4th of the same month he received, through Captain H. J. Mills, the following instructions:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 4, 1865.

Captain H. J. MILLS,

Provost Marshal Fifth District New Jersey:

Until otherwise ordered, you are directed to allow credits for such men as Lieutenant Colonel Ilges, captain fourteenth United States infantry, certifies to you as enlisted by him. He is recruiting at Hoboken. Inform Colonel Ilges of this order. This command is special and confidential.

JAMES M. FRY,
Provost Marshal General.

Between the 1st and 9th days of March Colonel Ilges received and mustered in fifty-four recruits. Of these, only three were enlisted with the understanding that they were ever to enter the service. The remaining fifty-one were enlisted with the knowledge that they were notorious "bounty-jumpers," and as soon as enlisted suffered to escape by passing out of a back room in the office. Certificates, regular in form were, from time to time, issued by Colonel Ilges, on account of such enlistments and muster, and delivered to Allen, Riley & Hughes, and by them sold to the authorities of Jersey City, which city received credit for the same.

On the 10th of March arrangements were made, in pursuance of the original plan, to arrest as bounty-jumpers all who might apply for enlistment or who might enlist at that office on that day. It was expected that a large number—at least one thousand—might be thus secured. But the plot was discovered by the bounty-jumpers in time to prevent its consummation to the extent anticipated, and only one hundred and eighty-three persons were thus arrested and secured. Upon these enlistments being made, Colonel Ilges, in pursuance of said orders from General Fry, issued certificates of their regular enlistments, delivered the same to Allen, Riley & Hughes, which they sold to the authorities of Jersey City, to be credited upon its quota. For these certificates of credit or enlistment the authorities of Jersey City paid Allen, Riley & Hughes $126,000. Of this sum, however, Colonel Ilges required, in conformity to the aforesaid "general order," the sum of $300 of the bounty money of each recruit to be deposited with him. In the cases of three out of the one hundred and eighty-three so-called bounty-jumpers this was neglected. As respects all the others it was complied with, so as to leave from this in the hands of Colonel Ilges the sum of $54,000. This money was at once deposited by Colonel Ilges in the Broadway National Bank, to await, as he says, the further order of the Provost Marshal General.

The money was immediately claimed by Messrs. Allen, Riley & Hughes, under an alleged contract with General Fry. Colonel Ilges, however, did not assent to their claim. But in view of the fact that the men enlisted were then known to have been incarcerated at Fort La Fayette, and that no steps were likely to be taken to prove them deserters, Colonel Ilges claimed that if the men were held for service without being convicted of any desertion it should then go to them; but if the men were proved to be deserters the United States Treasury should receive the money, or, in case the credits should be disallowed, that the money ought to be refunded to the local authorities, who had paid it in good faith, and who would otherwise be defrauded by the act of the Government itself.

Colonel Ilges states that on his application to Messrs. Allen, Riley & Hughes to pay the balance of the $900 which they had failed to deposit, they told him it was unnecessary to do so, as the whole amount in his hands ($54,000) would be paid back to them within a few days by order of the Provost Marshal General.

On the 18th of March, 1865, while the payment of the $54,000 was suspended, and the question as to who was entitled to receive it was pending, Theodore Allen, of the firm of Allen, Riley & Hughes, had an interview with General Fry, at the office of the latter in the city of Washington.

The account which Allen gives of the conversation which transpired at that interview, which your committee prefer to incorporate in the words of the witness, is as follows:

"I sent in my card into the War Department. I first saw the messenger, who told me that General Fry could not be seen, as it was past the hour for receiving anybody. I told him it was very important that I should see General Fry, and if General Fry knew I was there he would see me. He took my card. I then saw General Fry, and told him I had come in response to a letter or telegram from him to Colonel Baker, requesting me to come to Washington and call upon him."

"Question. What did General Fry answer to that?"
 "Answer. He said 'yes,' that he had telegraphed to Colonel Baker that he wished to see me; that he understood we had not been quite as successful in the Hoboken raid as we had expected. He then asked what had become of the money that had been received. I told him that I had it all, or the firm had it, with the exception of $54,000 that Colonel Ilges had retained. He asked if Colonel Baker had ever asked me for any part of that money. I told him no, he had not, and that Colonel Ilges held $54,000 of that money, and that I considered I was entitled to it through the agreement between General Fry, myself, and Colonel Baker, and that Colonel Ilges held it and would not pay it over till he was ordered to do so by General Fry, on the ground that the general order would not allow him to do so unless General Fry ordered him to do so. He then said, 'That is all well; we shall see about it.' Said he, 'The matter I wanted to see you most about was with reference to recruiting affairs at Utica.' I told him I was acquainted with a party named Burke and another named Richardson, who were doing recruiting business at Utica, and thought I could get all the information possible. He said he thought so too, and that he thought I was just the person to get all the information, and for that reason he had sent for me, because he would not trust any of Colonel Baker's officers. He said there appeared to be in Utica enormous frauds in the provost marshal's department as it was conducted by Captain Crandall, and that he wanted to get at these frauds; that he had tried and had not been successful, and that he wished me to go to Utica. I told him I thought, from what I had known of recruiting in Utica, and from what I had heard, that if he had found out any frauds in Utica I did not think they would implicate Captain Crandall, but would point more directly to Major Haddock. He said he did not want any evidence against Major Haddock, but against Captain Crandall, and he also wanted evidence that would implicate Mr. CONKLING in the frauds, because he had set himself in opposition to him (General Fry) as the champion of Captain Crandall, and that he wished me to proceed immediately to Utica and get that evidence. He said he wished me to go to Utica and get evidence that would implicate Mr. CONKLING in the frauds with Captain Crandall at all hazards; and while I was gone that he would order this money that Colonel Ilges held to be paid over to me. I told him it was better that it be paid to Riley, as he was the treasurer. He said the order should be made. That closed the conversation. I then left and went back to New York."

On the 18th of March, the following telegram was sent by General Fry to Colonel Baker:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
 PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S BUREAU,
 WASHINGTON, D. C., March 18, 1865.

Colonel L. C. BAKER,
 No. 12 Vesey street, New York:

Allen is here, and tells me he can provide information about the Utica district. I have told him to do so. He starts back to New York to-night, and will see you. Produce all the facts in that case.

JAMES B. FRY,
 Provost Marshal General.

Colonel Ilges states that, having deposited the $54,000 in the bank on the 15th of March, he proceeded on the 17th of March to Washington city, and, in person, related to Provost Marshal General Fry all the details connected with the office at Hoboken, the capture of the one hundred and eighty-three so-called bounty-jumpers, and the amount of money in his hands, asking, at the same time, for instructions in regard to the disposal of the money. To which General Fry replied that further orders would be sent by mail; that he (Colonel Ilges) then expressed to General Fry his fear that, at some future day he might be called upon for explanations why he had, at his office at Hoboken, acted contrary to existing orders and regulations governing the mustering service, and that he intended to ask for a court of inquiry, when Provost Marshal General Fry assured him that he had done his duty well, and only obeyed orders.

On the 19th of March he received the following dispatch:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
 PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S OFFICE,
 WASHINGTON, D. C., March 19, 1865.

COLONEL: I am directed by the Provost Marshal General to inform you that the credits of the men mustered by you March 11, 1865, at Hoboken, New Jersey, and credited to Jersey City at large, are disallowed, and that you will refund the money to the parties who advanced it.

I am, colonel, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
 W. OWENS.

Captain 6th United States Cavalry, A. A. A. G.
 Brevet Lieutenant Colonel GUIDO ILGES, U. S. A.,
 Mustering Officer, Hoboken, New Jersey.

On the 21st of March the following communication was sent by Colonel Ilges to the Provost Marshal General:

RECRUITING SERVICE FOURTEENTH INFANTRY,
 163 HESTER STREET, NEW YORK CITY,
 March 21, 1865.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of March 19, 1865, informing me that the credits of men mustered by me March 11, 1865, at Hoboken, New Jersey, and credited to Jersey City at large, are disallowed, and instructing me to refund this money to the parties who advanced it.

I beg leave to state that no men were mustered by me on the aforesaid date, but I infer that this communication meant to say the 10th instead of the 11th of March, 1865.

I would respectfully state that on the said day four regulars were mustered by me, and that if their credits are not to be affected they should be excluded in the order. I mustered on the 10th day of March one hundred and eighty-three volunteers for three years' so-called bounty-jumpers, and they were credited to Jersey City at large, with the exception of fifteen recruits that were credited to Clinton township, Essex county, fourth congressional district, New Jersey.

I would further state that I have at my disposal $300 local bounty for each of these one hundred and eighty-three recruits, and that I received this amount from Allen, Riley & Co., who had contracted with the counties for these credits; and I would therefore respectfully request that you inform me whether or not I am to refund this money to these parties, or to the proper representatives of the classes who received the credits.

These one hundred and eighty-three recruits were properly mustered into the service by me, and I credited them according to instructions and orders regulating the mustering service. None of these recruits have as yet been proven to have been credited before; and when I gave these credits I did so as a United States officer, believing that I was doing my duty, and advancing the interests of the plan of Colonel Baker, sanctioned by the Provost Marshal General. I am informed that the county representatives who received these credits paid a large amount of premiums to Messrs. Allen, Riley & Co., besides the $300 local bounty; and as they have done so after having been informed by me of the correctness of these credits, I would respectfully call your attention to the fact that when these credits are disallowed the said localities will lose a large amount of money paid out by them in good faith. I am not aware what amount of money was paid to Messrs. Allen, Riley & Co. for each recruit, and cannot even give a probable guess, as I only collected the usual amount from them—$300 for each recruit, this being the amount of bounty paid to a recruit enlisted at Hoboken, New Jersey.

I would here add that Messrs. Allen, Riley & Co. are the parties who carried out the plan above referred to, and I only allowed them to be present in my office, and to contract for these credits contrary to existing orders, after I had been assured by Colonel L. C. Baker, special agent of the War Department, that the whole proceeding was sanctioned by the Provost Marshal General United States Army.

I therefore respectfully request that you inform me, at your earliest convenience, what disposition I am to make of the money referred to.

I remain, captain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
 GUIDO ILGES, Captain 14th Infantry,
 Brevet Lieutenant Colonel Vols., Recruiting Officer.
 Captain W. OWENS,
 5th U. S. Cavalry, A. A. A. G., Washington, D. C.

In reply to this letter of the 21st, Colonel Ilges received on the 24th of the same month the following reply:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
 PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S BUREAU,
 WASHINGTON, D. C., March 23, 1865.

COLONEL: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 21st instant, and, in reply, would state that the communication of the 19th instant, referred to, was intended to cover the cases of the one hundred and eighty-three so-called bounty-jumpers, and that the amount which you received for the purpose of paying bounties to these one hundred and eighty-three so-called bounty-jumpers the provost marshal directs to be refunded to the parties who advanced it.

I am, colonel, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
 W. OWENS.

Captain 5th U. S. Cavalry, A. A. A. G.
 Brevet Lieutenant Colonel GUIDO ILGES,
 United States Army, Hester Street, New York.

The suspicions of Allen, as he alleges, had been somewhat excited by the course of General Fry in the transaction between them, and he resolved if possible, as he says, to circumvent him, and accordingly he communicated the result of his interview with General Fry to various parties at New York, and resolved not to go to Utica, but to wait at New York a sufficient time to induce in General Fry's mind a belief that he had in fact complied with his agreement, and then sent to him the following dispatch:

[No. 51.]
 AMERICAN TELEGRAPH COMPANY,
 March 24, 1865.

Brigadier General Fry,
 Provost Marshal General, Washington, D. C.:

I have just returned from Utica, and Colonel Ilges refuses to deliver the money received from me because your order is dated the 11th instead of 10th of March. Please answer through Colonel Baker.

THEO. ALLEN.
 Please write your address under your signature.

On the same day the following telegram was sent by General Fry to Colonel Baker:

[Original by telegraph.]
 WAR DEPARTMENT,
 PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S BUREAU,
 WASHINGTON, D. C., March 24, 1865.

Colonel L. C. BAKER,
 No. 12 Vesey Street, New York City:

I have been informed by Theodore Allen, of New York, that Colonel Ilges declines to turn over the money received from the bounty-jumpers on the 11th instant. I wish you to see Colonel Ilges and have him turn over this money as directed.

JAMES B. FRY,
 Provost Marshal General.

On the 24th of March, Messrs. Allen, Riley & Hughes, in company with a Mr. Stanley, called upon Colonel Ilges, demanded of him the $54,000, and upon his refusing to give up the money to them until he could see Colonel L. C. Baker and ask his advice in the matter, they threatened immediate legal proceedings to compel the delivery of the money. Colonel Ilges then called upon Colonel Baker at his office, but being unable to see him at that time, he proceeded to the office of the United States district attorney, D. L. Smith, Esq., No. 12 Chambers street, and laid the case before one of the attorneys in his office, who advised him not to give up the money until he had further orders from Washington. He also consulted with several officers of the regular Army then in the city, and was by them advised to the same effect.

On the 25th of March, 1861, Colonel Ilges was again sent for by Colonel L. C. Baker, and upon his arrival at Colonel Baker's office a telegraphic dispatch was shown him by Colonel Baker from the Provost Marshal General, directing him to order Colonel Ilges to turn over the amount of money ($54,000) held by him as bounty for the one hundred and eighty-three so-called bounty-jumpers to Messrs. Allen, Riley & Co. After some hesitation Colonel Ilges then proceeded to the National Broadway Bank, accompanied by Messrs. Allen, Riley, Hughes, and Stanley, and there drew the following check:

No. 24. NEW YORK, March 25, 1865.
 National Broadway Bank, pay to Messrs. Peter Riley & Co., or bearer, fifty-four thousand dollars, ($54,000.)
 GUIDO ILGES, Capt. 14th U. S. Inf.,
 Brevet Lt. Col. U. S. A., Recruiting Officer.

This check was then handed to Peter Riley in the presence of the others, and he presented it to the paying teller of the said bank and received the $54,000 in payment of the same.

On the 25th of March General Fry sent the following dispatch to Colonel Baker:

PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S BUREAU,
 WASHINGTON, D. C., March 25, 1865.

Colonel L. C. BAKER, New York:
 You must prepare all the facts in the case of the Utica district without reference to Major Luddington's report. It is absolutely necessary for me to have them, whether Major Luddington has been able to obtain them or not. See Allen and let him make it his business to straighten this matter out.

JAMES B. FRY,
 Provost Marshal General.

It was charged against General Fry, by Mr. CONKLING, that the motives of the former in his action in regard to the Utica district were to be found in his relations with Major John A. Haddock, who was engaged in fraudulent practices at Elmira, from which it suited the policy of General Fry to divert public attention by the prosecution of the alleged frauds at Utica. It appeared from the evidence before your committee that, some time prior to the transactions at Hoboken referred to, Major John A. Haddock, acting assistant provost marshal for the western district of New York, had been suspected of the most flagrant and corrupt violations of official duty. Detailed reports of specific acts of official dishonesty committed by him had been made to General Fry in writing on several occasions. One by Edward Meloy, dated February 3, 1865, and another by Peter A. La France, dated February 28, 1865. Two of the alleged accomplices of Haddock in the fraudulent practices reported, named Webell and Dalton, were arrested and afterward sent to the penitentiary. Haddock himself, however, was not then arrested nor relieved from duty. But on the 15th day of March, 1865, Colonel L. C. Baker telegraphed to Provost Marshal General Fry to the effect that he had discovered most astounding enlistment frauds at Elmira, with which Major Haddock was connected. Soon afterward Major Haddock was arrested by order of the Secretary of War, a court-martial was convened in his case, and Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING authorized by the War Department to represent the Government at his trial.

If there be any circumstances in the testimony which are susceptible of further explanation, either by General Fry or Colonel Baker, (to both of whom many of the statements relate,) your committee have not had the benefit of their knowledge, as neither appeared as a witness in the case. As your committee have already explained, their investigation of the matters with which they have been charged by the order of the House has thus far been confined to that branch of the case relating to the charges made by General Fry against Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING, leaving the other branch of the case relating to the charges made by Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING against the Provost Marshal General untouched. Whatever evidence there may be contained in the report of your committee which may raise a question touching the management of the Provost Marshal General's Bureau has been admitted solely on account of its supposed relation to the motives of General Fry in the publication of his charges against Mr. CONKLING, as has already been explained. So far, therefore, as the committee have deemed it pertinent for that purpose, they have heard and considered it, and for no other. It would be premature, and might work injustice if your committee, at this stage of their investigation, were to pronounce affirmatively in advance upon a branch of the case only collaterally introduced, and still further to be heard and considered. Your committee therefore refrain altogether from expressing their judgment upon the guilt or innocence of General Fry on the charge of the alleged corrupt bargain with Allen and his connection with the Hoboken enlistments.

They refrain also from any expression of their opinions as to the credit to be attached to the testimony of Theodore Allen, (a witness sought to be impeached by the party against whom he was called;) nor does your committee undertake to say at this time how far the testimony of the said Allen is corroborated and sustained by the other testimony in the case. So far, however, as any of the evidence before your committee bears upon the point for the illustration of which it was admitted they have not failed fully to consider it. Whatever relative weight has been attached by your committee to the various testimony in the case which brought them to their conclusion in reference to the motives of General Fry in writing the BLAINE letter, it cannot be important at this time to announce, since their conclusion on that point is not equivocal, and is the unanimous judgment of the committee.

The following copies of what purport to be two letters—one by Colonel L. C. Baker, and the other by General Fry—appear in a printed argument by Hon. A. G. Riddle, which has been laid upon the tables of the members of this House:

OFFICE SPECIAL AGENCY WAR DEPARTMENT,
NEW YORK, March 16, 1865.

SIR: Since the capture of bounty-jumpers at Hoboken repeated applications have been made to me to have said jumpers credited to the State of New Jersey. Colonel Ilges, the mustering officer, applied to me, before going to Washington last week, to make application to you to have said jumpers so credited. I informed him that I did not think these men could or would be credited, advising him (Colonel Ilges) to apply to you for the required instructions or permission.

On Tuesday last, while in Washington, and after my conversation with you on the subject referred to above, I received a telegram from Colonel Ilges, requesting me to obtain permission to make these credits. This telegram I made no reply to. On my return to New York yesterday morning I heard that Colonel Ilges had made the credits. I sent for him and asked him by whose order or direction he had done so. He referred me to your telegram of March 5, addressed to Captain H. J. Mills, provost marshal at Newark, New Jersey, for his authority. I informed him (Colonel Ilges) that I did not think that you intended, by the telegram referred to, to convey any order or authority to Captain Mills to credit bounty-jumpers and deserters; that your telegram was intended to only authorize the crediting of such men as were regularly and legitimately enlisted previous to the Friday on which it was understood that none but jumpers and deserters were to be enlisted. I have advised Colonel Ilges to go to Washington to-night, and to make such explanations in reference to this matter as you may require. These explanations, I trust, will be satisfactory.

I am, general, very respectfully, yours,
L. C. BAKER,
Colonel and Special Agent War Department.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S BUREAU,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 23, 1865.

COLONEL: By the course of things in reference to bounty-jumpers taken at Hoboken, Mayor Cleveland, of Newark, is placed in a very unfortunate position. If possible, he should be relieved from it. Under date of March 23 I directed Colonel Ilges to return the money in his possession to the parties who advanced it as bounties for these men, the credits for them being disallowed, and the money still in his possession. It seems that under this order, reported by telegraph to you on the 24th of March, Colonel Ilges has delivered the money in whole or part to Theodore Allen, broker, and perhaps to some other brokers, and that Mayor Cleveland is unable to regain possession of it.

The proper method of disposing of this business has all the time seemed to me plain enough: it is this: to allow no credits for the bounty-jumpers, men who have already been enlisted and credited several times over, but to credit any, if there be any, who are bona fide recruits, and not jumpers. To return to the town authorities all the money they advanced on account of men whom we do not credit.

I intended my order to carry out the above view, but it seems that the money advanced by Newark has been returned to Allen, the broker; perhaps it was turned over to Colonel Ilges, through Allen, and on this account he returns it in the same way. However that may be, Allen should return the money to Newark, and I desire you to see Allen and tell him so. Neither he nor any one else has any right to profit in the matter. All necessary expenses connected with the arrest of these jumpers, and the enlistment of such as are proper recruits, must be paid by the United States, so that there is no loss for individuals in the case.

Please report to me as soon as practicable on the adjustment of this affair.

You had better send for Mayor Cleveland also.
Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES B. FRY,
Provost Marshal General.
Colonel L. C. BAKER, No. 12 Vesey street, New York City.

The opening argument in the summing up before the committee was made orally on behalf of General Fry by Mr. Riddle, and was reported by one of the reporters of the House. To this Mr. CONKLING replied. Mr. Riddle rejoined in an oral argument, but which was not reported, and he had leave of the committee to reduce to writing this rejoinder, confining it to the argument actually delivered, this to be reported to the House along with the other arguments in the case.

No member of the committee has any recollection of either of these two letters being either given in evidence in the case or alluded to in any part of the argument; and no member of the committee has any recollection of ever seeing the original of either of these letters, and neither of them has yet been furnished to the committee. The first knowledge which any member of the committee had, so far as can be recollected, of either letter, was after writing the foregoing part of this report, and upon seeing the printed argument of Mr. Riddle. The committee understand it to be now claimed by the counsel for Mr. CONKLING that these letters were not offered in evidence, nor alluded to in the argument, and doubts are expressed to the committee as to the authenticity of one or both. General Fry's counsel insist that these letters were given in evidence and commented upon. Since the committee's attention has thus been called to them, their effect in the case (treating them as authentic) has been, by your committee, carefully considered, and they do not change any conclusions submitted in this report to which your committee had come before they were seen. These letters never having been in the possession of any member of the committee, the committee cannot, of course, make any decision whatever as to whether these alleged copies are copies of genuine letters of the dates they bear; but the committee submit these alleged copies with this explanation, that the House and all parties may have the benefit of them.

Your committee report to the House the argument of Mr. Riddle, as printed by him, with the above statement, as to its correspondence with the argument made to the committee. They do this because the committee are not willing to deprive General Fry of any fact or argument in his defense which he may desire to bring to the attention of the House to influence its action, although it may not have been submitted to the committee during its deliberations. No injustice, so far as the results of the committee's action is concerned, can be done to Mr. CONKLING by this course, as the committee came to no conclusion as to the subject-matter of these letters which is adverse to him.

Your committee have refrained from making any recommendation as to proceedings by the House against General Fry for this breach of its privileges. The reasons for this are in part to be found in the circumstances connected with the introduction of General Fry's letter into this House by one of its members. The committee doubted whether the House would be inclined, or ought to adopt, any further proceedings against General Fry touching this violation of its privileges, except in connection with the examination of Mr. BLAINE's relations to this matter. The latter is wholly outside of the powers of your committee.

Besides, all of the facts, and also the conclusions of law and fact derived therefrom which bear upon the question of the propriety of any further proceedings touching this breach of its privileges, are by your committee here submitted to the House; and hence the House will have no difficulty in deciding what its action should be in this regard, and would not be assisted by any mere opinion or recommendation of the committee upon a question lying so peculiarly within the limits of the discretion of the House, and to be determined by its sense of fitness.

The execution of that part of the order of the House in relation to the charges against General Fry and his bureau will involve an enormous amount of labor and of expense, and can be properly performed only by a committee having a competent clerk and photographic reporter, and having leave to sit at the places where the witnesses reside, and during the sessions of the House, and also during the recess of Congress. Whether, now that the war is over, the public good to be attained by these investigations will compensate for the large expense they will involve is a consideration which should receive the attention of the House.

Your committee, having fully and carefully considered the charges against Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING contained in the letter of General Fry, are unanimously of opinion that none of the charges in the letter, whether made directly and openly, or indirectly and covertly, have any foundation in truth, and that the conduct of Mr. CONKLING in relation to each of the matters investigated by the committee has been above reproach, and that no circumstances sufficient to excite reasonable suspicion have arisen which could justify or excuse the attack made upon him in the letter of General Fry.

The several charges against Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING, contained in the letter of General Fry, being unsupported by the testimony in any one material particular, although ample opportunity was afforded, at the cost of much time and expense, to enable the writer of that letter to furnish his proofs, the committee ought not to refrain from the expression of their condemnation of the deliberate act of a public functionary in traducing the official as well as the personal character of a member of the House of Representatives of the United States by the publication of a libel which he was so illy prepared to sustain. Indignities offered to the character or proceedings of the national Legislature by libelous assaults have been resented and punished both in England and the United States as breaches of privilege; and such assaults upon the official character of members have been held punishable as indignities committed against the House itself. The reason for this rests upon the same ground as that which justifies the exercise of similar authority to punish for attempts by personal violence, menaces, or bribes to influence the conduct of members in their official capacity.

Your committee deem it proper most earnestly to protest against the practice which has obtained, to some extent, of causing letters from persons not members of the House to be read as a part of a personal explanation, in which the motives of members are criticised, their conduct censured, and they are called to answer for words spoken in debate. Such attacks upon members, made in the House itself, and published in its proceedings, and scattered broadcast to the world at the expense of the Government, are, in the opinion of your committee, an improper check upon the freedom of debate, a violation of the privileges, and an infraction of the dignity of the House.

Your committee submit, for the consideration of the House, the following resolutions, and recommend their adoption:

Resolved, That all the statements contained in the letter of General James B. Fry to Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE, a member of this House, bearing date the 27th of April, A. D. 1865, and which was read in this House on the 30th of April, A. D. 1865, in so far as such statements impute to Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING, a member of this House, any criminal, illegal, unpatriotic, or otherwise improper conduct or motives, either as to the matter of his procuring himself to be employed by the Government of the United States in the prosecution of military offenses in the State of New York, in the management of such prosecutions, in taking compensation therefor, or in any other charge, are wholly without foundation in truth; and for their publication there were, in the judgment of this House, no facts connected with said prosecutions furnishing either a palliation or an excuse.

Resolved, That General Fry, an officer of the Government of the United States, and head of one of its military bureaus, in writing and publishing these accusations named in the preceding resolution, and which, owing to the crimes and wrongs which they impute to a member of this body, are of a nature deeply injurious to the official and personal character, influence, and privileges of such member, and their publication originating, as in the judgment of the House they did, in no misapprehension of facts, but in the resentment and passion of their author, was guilty of a gross violation of the privileges of such member and of this House, and his conduct in that regard merits and receives its unqualified disapprobation.

DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPALDING, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon House bill No. 261, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, made the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 261) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, as follows to their respective Houses:

That the Senate recede from their amendment numbered one, and agree to the same with an amendment substituting the word "fifty" in lieu of "forty" in line seven, page 2, of the bill; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their amendment numbered two, and agree to the same with an amendment substituting the words "sixty-five" in lieu of "fifty" in line eight, page 2; and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered fourteen, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: strike out of said amendment all after the words "Department of State," and insert in lieu thereof, "and also an examiner of claims for the same Department whose salary shall be $8,000 per annum; and the salary of the second Assistant Secretary of State shall be $3,500 per annum, and such sums are hereby appropriated."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered fifteen, and agree to the same amended as follows: strike out the words "than $8,000 in any one year," and substitute as follows: "than $2,500 in any one year over and above the expenses of office rent and clerk hire, to be approved by the Secretary of State, of which returns shall be made to the Secretary of the Treasury;" and the Senate agree to the same, so amended.

That the House recede from their amendment to the amendment of the Senate numbered nine, and strike out the whole of it and substitute in lieu thereof as follows: "and no money shall be paid to the present minister resident at Portugal, out of any fund whatever, on account of further services in his office;" and also strike out the word "Portugal" on page 1, line ten, of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same so amended.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House of their amendment numbered six, and agree to the same.

LYMAN TRUMBULL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
R. P. SPALDING,
N. P. BANKS,
JOHN WENTWORTH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I call the previous question upon agreeing to the report.

Mr. RAYMOND. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. SPALDING. Very well; I will hear it.

Mr. RAYMOND. I should like to hear from the gentleman, if he is disposed to make any explanation whatever, what reason influenced the committee to recommend the abolition of the salary hitherto attached to the mission at Portugal, so far as the present incumbent is concerned.

Mr. SPALDING. I have no objection to make a statement as an individual; I am not instructed as a member of the committee of conference to make any statement. I can only say to the gentleman that the committee were unanimous in coming to the conclusion that no appropriation should be made for the continuance of the salary of the present minister at Portugal. They have provided in the amendment, which was concurred in unanimously by the managers on the part of the Senate and on the part of the House, that the present incumbent of the mission to Portugal should not be paid anything for further services, out of any fund whatever; and I may say that the reason for this conclusion was that they consider him as entirely unworthy of the confidence of the Government.

Mr. RAYMOND. Will the gentleman allow me to make another remark on this subject?

Mr. SPALDING. No, sir; I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. RAYMOND. I ask the gentleman to allow me, out of mere courtesy, a remark on this point.

Mr. SPALDING. I think I have stretched the courtesy now. I object to any further debate.

Mr. RAYMOND. I am sorry that I cannot concur in the gentleman's opinion as to the extent of his courtesy.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FEES OF CONSULAR OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith transmit to Congress a report, dated 12th instant, with the accompanying papers received from the Secretary of State, in compliance with the requirements of the eighteenth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States," approved August 18, 1856.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 17, 1866.

COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on a Uniform System of Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to the resolution of yesterday, requesting information relative to proposed international movements, in connection with the Paris Universal Exposition, for the reform of systems of coinage, weights, and measures, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, and the documents by which it was accompanied.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 17, 1866.

INDIAN AFFAIRS IN DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in reply to a resolution of the House of May 23, 1866, in regard to the conduct of Indian affairs in Dakota Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

PROVOST MARSHAL'S BUREAU—AGAIN.

Mr. SPALDING. By the indulgence of the chairman of the committee, I beg leave to present to the House the memorial of Mr. Riddle, counsel for General Fry, together with a portion of the evidence which he claims was offered to the committee by General Fry, which he asks may be made a part of the record in the case.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is necessary.

Mr. HALE. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I certainly object. It would be outside of all precedent.

Mr. SPALDING. Very well; I have discharged my duty.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will make a statement to the House in regard to those papers. Since the committee made its report to the House its attention has been invited to the papers which have been referred to by my colleague, and they have received the attention of the committee. Although the papers are not before the House, I desire, in justice to the committee, to make a statement in reference to the matter. These papers relate in the main to the Hoboken matter, a matter upon which the committee has not passed in its findings except so far as it might throw light upon the animus of the letter to Mr.

BLAINE. The introduction and consideration of those papers, therefore, could not affect any conclusion to which the committee came, except in regard to the motives for writing that letter. There is, outside of these papers, what the committee deemed abundant evidence to settle the question of the animus of the letter and to bring the committee unanimously to the conclusion which it attained as to the motives which prompted the writing of that letter; so that, while the committee's attention was not drawn to these papers, they thus considered the matter of their contents, and determined nothing contained in them in any possible view of this case affecting any conclusion to which the committee came.

Another statement I have to make is, that those letters, if they are of value to General Fry, will be available for his defense in the further prosecution of this matter, should the House deem any further prosecution proper under the resolution already adopted. So that it seems to me in no view can any prejudice be worked to General Fry by the exclusion for the present of these letters.

Another statement I desire here to make is, that the two letters deemed most material by the counsel for General Fry, the only two, if I remember correctly, which he deemed of value enough to insert in his printed argument, are now introduced into the report of the committee, perhaps irregularly, but introduced in extreme solicitude that nothing should be excluded that could be of service to General Fry. That matter is fully explained in the report of the committee. As I have said, the two principal letters contained in this memorial now appear in the report of the committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the House has heard or had an opportunity of hearing a large portion of this report. The committee felt forced to make it voluminous, as it is, on account of the impossibility of making it less voluminous and yet present fairly and justly the facts bearing on this important question of the privileges of the House, and of a member of it.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, I will not be deemed in doing what I am about to do as neglecting the execution of the duties which I owe to this important question of privilege in omitting to detain the House in again presenting what has been fully presented in the report of the committee. I say I will refrain from the discussion of this question at this time. Unless something shall be said by other members of the House requiring notice I shall content myself by yielding the floor and permitting any other gentleman who may wish to do so to speak to this question. I shall ask the House to second the previous question so that we shall fix the time for closing debate, disposing of the case to-day. If there be no member who desires to be heard I ask the House at once to order the main question.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. For whatever time the gentleman wants.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy but a few moments in submitting to the House one or two considerations connected with the subject before us. I shall not enlarge upon the evidence, or upon the clear, able, and conclusive report founded upon it, exonerating completely and entirely the reputation of my colleague [Mr. CONKLING] from the gross aspersions cast upon it in the communication which the committee have with entire unanimity pronounced a false and malicious libel.

The question, Mr. Speaker, is one of grave importance, affecting the right of a member of this House to utter his sentiments and opinions in respect to the action of any public officer or the administration of any Department of the Government, legitimately before the House, without being confronted by a libel upon his private or public character, read at the Clerk's desk at the suggestion of a member upon the floor. I am happy this investigation has been ordered by the House, and I trust the report of the committee has had a due effect on the House, and that the action of the committee in reference to the assault against the character of my honorable colleague [Mr. CONKLING] will meet with its unanimous approval. I know not why this House should listen with any other feelings than those of perfect indignation at the attempt made by an officer of the Government to assail the character of a member of this House for commenting on the manner in which that officer discharged his public duties.

What is the history of the matter? In legitimate debate on the section of the Army bill relating to the Provost Marshal's Bureau, the honorable member from New York [Mr. CONKLING] made some remarks to which the Provost Marshal General took exceptions. In answer, not by way of legitimate argument on the subject before the House, the gentleman from Maine had a letter from General Fry read at the desk containing the grossest charges against the honorable member from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] involving personal turpitude and corruption, as well as malfeasance in office. These charges were such as, if true, would subject my colleague [Mr. CONKLING] to deserved reproach, and to the loss of public or private confidence. They have been carefully and patiently investigated by the committee; abundant time was offered to establish their truth, and yet the author of these grave charges failed signally either to prove or even attempt to prove that he was sustained by one single fact in justification.

The important inquiry arises, Mr. Speaker, whether members are thus to be assailed by persons outside of the House for words uttered in legitimate debate in the House affecting the action of any public officer or the administration of any Department or bureau of the Government. If such a precedent shall be established, I see no end to these libelous attacks springing from what any member may deem it his duty to utter in regard to the action of any public officer.

But I wish to call attention to another consideration connected with this subject. The letter of General Fry was addressed to a member of this House, and at the instance of that member it was read at the Clerk's desk in vindication of remarks before made by him upon the relations existing between Mr. CONKLING and General Fry. I do not believe that any member of the House has the right for any such purpose to send up to the Clerk's desk a letter from a third party containing libelous matter affecting another member, and to ask that it be read to the House and circulated, through the Globe, over the country. If this be not a breach of privilege, I am unable to say what is. If it be not, any party designing it may publish the most offensive and improper matter in respect to a member and yet screen himself from liability on the ground that he was using information imparted by another and incorporating into his speech, and thus spreading a libel upon the permanent records of the country. If we admit that principle, then, as I said before, there is no end to the libels which may be read here against members for the expression of their opinions in this Hall.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I desire to ask my friend whether he thinks it quite proper or dignified for any member of this House, in discussing a public question, to bring into discredit the name of a public officer, when that officer has no chance upon the floor of the House to defend himself.

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer my friend. For the very reason that the parties are public officers, that they are charged with the duties of official administration, that they are servants of the Government, and that Congress has not only the right, but is bound to examine into their action, I aver that a member may rightfully criticise it. I say it involves no breach of privilege, and no discourtesy, for any member of this House to speak in regard to the conduct of a public officer of this Government legitimately before it for consideration in such terms as he may think proper.

If charges were made by my colleague against the administration of General Fry of the affairs of the Provost Marshal's Bureau, he as an officer of the Army, charged with malfeasance in a military duty, had a right to demand from the War Department a court of inquiry to investigate his conduct. He had here a perfect redress; or he might have appealed to this House, demanding that a committee be charged with the examination of the alleged malfeasance, and that the author of the charges be required to substantiate them or retract them. Sir, the very necessities of the public service require that the Representatives of the people shall be untrammelled upon this floor in their criticisms upon the action of the public servants; and if the lips of members are to be sealed in respect to official administration, I know not in what way the public are to be informed on subjects of the deepest general interest, in connection with which individual agents and officers may merit either censure or praise.

But, sir, my object is not to enter into detail upon the facts of this case so abundantly reported, but rather to ascertain by some appropriate mode of inquiry what are the rights and what are the restrictions which should be allowed or imposed upon this practice of presenting letters containing libelous matter to be read as part of debate in this House. Therefore, at a proper time, now or hereafter, I will offer a resolution simply asking an investigation by the same committee as to the fact whether any breach of privilege has been committed by any act of this kind in the introduction of any such letter by any person. And I am induced to do that more from the consideration that I believe we must put our foot upon this practice or we must be involved in these interminable difficulties and personal explanations. I wish to say that I do this without any sort of disrespect to any member upon this floor, without any personal feeling whatever, but from a sole desire to preserve that order and decorum in this House which should belong to its deliberations.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the report of this committee or the resolutions submitted by them, but I simply seek the floor in consequence of my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] having intimated that he would move a resolution of reference as to the rights of the House, and the rights of members of the House in regard to the publication of libels like that reported upon by the committee; and I rise for the purpose of suggesting to my colleague that when he offers that resolution he make it a little more comprehensive, so as to cover another branch of this case, which has come to my knowledge within the last two days. The report of the committee has been exhaustive of the subject committed to it so far as affects the charges brought against my colleague in the libelous letter which was read at the Clerk's desk.

Since the hearing before the committee was terminated and since their report was made to the House, I have received through the mail, and I understand other members have received the same document, a pamphlet bearing the printed signature of James B. Fry, whom I understand to be this same Provost Marshal General Fry, purporting to be instructions by Mr. Fry to his counsel for his defense before this committee. It strikes me as a little singular that the private instructions of the person on trial to his counsel for the defense should be printed and circulated among the body which was to pass upon the subject after the counsel has been heard in full before the committee, and his argument printed for the benefit of the House. In that pamphlet I find this very remarkable language, which I think involves, if possible, a higher breach of privilege even than the original one. For bear in mind that this is printed, or at least circulated, after the report of the committee, falsifying the original charge.

This pamphlet says:

"Of the principal charges (contained in my letter) I maintain and reassert not only the substantial but the literal correctness."

In other words, after a fair trial and examination before a committee, with every opportunity afforded him to maintain his original charges, and utterly failing to produce any evidence whatever to maintain them, a pamphlet is here circulated in which the original libel is reasserted in its full length and breadth, and in all its details. I submit that there is a question of privilege for the examination, consideration, and action of this House.

Another word in regard to this document. It states by way of preface that this was a letter of instructions which was addressed by General Fry to his counsel, Hon. A. G. Riddle, on the eve of the oral plea which Mr. Riddle made in compliance with the requirement of the committee. If that were so truthfully, of course these instructions would be privileged, as long as confined to their proper and legitimate use, but not when published for the reading of anybody besides the counsel. But most singularly Mr. Riddle, in his argument as the counsel for General Fry, states to the committee that he has had no opportunity of consulting with his client and has received no instructions from him, oral or written, except upon a single point, while these instructions cover the whole case. If the counsel told the truth in his statement to the committee, it would appear that this officer of the Army of the United States was not only guilty of publishing a libel and a pronounced libel on a member of the House, but was guilty of doing it on the false pretence that it was originally prepared and sent forth as instructions to counsel when it was not the fact, and when no such instructions had been issued.

I therefore ask my colleague, [Mr. DAVIS,] when he introduces his resolution to inquire into the rights of members, to include the question whether the House shall submit to such publications as that contained in the pamphlet which I hold in my hand.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The gentleman from New York has brought to the attention of the House this letter of General Fry, and it seems to be proper that I should allude to his statements contained in that letter. The first is the statement that a request was made by General Fry to the investigating committee for the privilege of preparing and submitting by himself or by his counsel a written plea, which request was not granted.

Now, I really cannot conceive what it is that that statement refers to unless it be this: that at the time we began to examine this case, on the first morning of our meeting, General Fry applied to be permitted to make a written statement to the committee, introducing his case and his evidence, the written statement to be unsworn. He was met by a statement that any evidence that was to be considered by the committee must come in the usual way as clearly and properly authenticated papers, or the sworn testimony of witnesses, and that he would be required to present any showing against a member of the House in that way. Nothing else occurred excluding General Fry from the very largest latitude in presenting all the views of his counsel and of himself upon every possible question. Excluding myself from the compliment, I may say that the committee was a miracle of patience in the way of admitting and hearing arguments and testimony on both sides.

And there is another statement here that is equally singular, considering all the circumstances of the case. It is on the first page of this pamphlet. He says:

"I formally applied to the committee for a copy of the record, the testimony having been phonographically reported, and offered to pay the expenses of transcribing it, but was refused."

Now it will occur to every member of the House that it would be a very singular request to make of a committee of this House, whose proceedings are confidential and not to be disclosed except by the leave of the House, that it should be required to permit its evidence to go out into the town, into the offices of lawyers, and to be hawked about the streets. Of course the committee would not permit the evidence to be taken from the custody of the committee or of its clerk. The request was made to be permitted to take copies of the evidence. The request was met by a statement that the evidence could not be taken from the control of the committee or the custody of its clerk; but that the very fullest opportunity should be had at all times to use the evidence in the committee-room, and under the supervision and care of the clerk, he seeing to it that the proper orders and directions of the House were observed in that regard. And I am surprised that a statement of the character I have read should be made, under all the circumstances, by General Fry.

Mr. STEVENS. As the evidence has not been read, I desire to know whether I understand the purport of it. I desire to inquire whether, when General Fry was offered to be examined, he or his counsel insisted that he should be called by the committee so that he could not be prosecuted.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. In reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] I will state this: the committee, as has already been noticed, have confined their investigations for the present to the question of privilege affecting the rights of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] The committee so confining its investigations deemed it fair and proper that the gentleman from New York should be permitted to control the matter of the introduction of testimony affecting his personal privileges, subject of course, to the right of the committee to take care of the rights and the privileges of the House. Taking that view of the matter, the committee did not feel at liberty to call, as they might have done, General Fry upon the motion of the committee itself. They declined to do that for the reason that they deemed it just and proper to the gentleman from New York, this being a question so personal to himself, to allow him to control the introduction or the non-introduction of the testimony of General Fry. That was the position of the committee. Of course the committee might have called, upon its own motion, General Fry as a witness. It did not do so for the reason I have stated.

Then the committee had this question before them: the request was formally made and put upon the record that the gentleman from New York should be permitted to cross-examine General Fry. An appeal was made to the committee that it should put General Fry in the position of a witness for cross-examination, and not have him made the witness of the gentleman from New York, the gentleman from New York stating distinctly that he declined to put himself in the position of calling General Fry, so as that thereby he should be precluded from contradicting or impeaching any evidence he might give. After that appeal was thus formally made to the committee, and the committee had refused to permit General Fry to be cross-examined, requiring Mr. CONKLING, if he desired to use the testimony of General Fry, to call him and put him in the position of a witness called by himself, then an appeal was made to the other side to know whether General Fry was to be examined; and an invitation that he should be examined as a witness for the other side was repeatedly made. But that invitation was all the time declined; and Mr. CONKLING was deprived of the benefit of the examination of General Fry unless he would call him as his own witness.

Mr. STEVENS. Did the counsel of Mr. Fry join in declining?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. That is my understanding of the matter.

Mr. STEVENS. The explanations made by the committee are ample; they require no further vindication, if any was necessary, of their course. It was, perhaps, unfortunate that this letter was not addressed at once to the House instead of coming through a member of the House, for then I suppose it would have become a part of the records of the House. I understand that the letter is not now on the Journals of the House. If that be so, it will preclude the motion which I would otherwise be disposed to make.

The SPEAKER. It is in the Globe, but not on the Journal.

Mr. STEVENS. The inquiry instituted, the appointment of this committee, did not bring the letter upon the Journal?

The SPEAKER. It did not.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I cannot make the motion I would have made. All I have to say is that I do not know that a more causeless, gross attack has ever been made upon a member of this House, either here or elsewhere, than that contained in that letter. I must do the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] now absent, the justice to suppose that he was entirely uninformed of the contents of the letter or he would never have presented it to the House.

I had hope, however, that the committee would go a little further. In reference to one of the transactions mentioned in the report—the Hoboken matter, I believe—in which some hundreds of thousands of dollars were absorbed by somebody, there were, if the evidence is to be believed, three parties implicated. Two of them, I believe, are now in the penitentiary. The third is General Fry. Why is it that some steps have not been taken by the committee to send him there? It is possible that the committee had not the power. But after the exposure which has been made it seems to me that it is the duty of the law officers of the Government to prosecute him; and unless the evidence contained in this book can be disproved he should be convicted and confined in the penitentiary. I cannot conceive any reason why there should not be at once instituted a proceeding for the prosecution of General Fry. This would give him an opportunity to vindicate himself in some other way than by posthumous letters. I suppose, however, the committee did not feel themselves authorized to take action with a view to the prosecution of General Fry.

Mr. RAYMOND. I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In referring to the case in which two of the parties implicated are now in the penitentiary, the gentleman spoke of it as the Hoboken matter. I believe it was the Elmira case.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe the gentleman is correct. I happened to see the name of the other case here and was misled by it. The case I meant to refer to was, I believe, the Elmira fraud.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the House—I would not have stated it but for the inquiry just presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania—why the committee, after having found a flagrant violation of the privileges of a member of the House and of the House itself, stopped without recommending any proceeding by the House against the culprit. The inquiry is very pertinent, one which would naturally occur to every mind, and one which received the careful attention of the committee.

The committee did not deem it outside of the powers conferred upon it by the resolution to recommend such proceedings against General Fry as the House might deem to be due in the premises. The committee report to the House its reasons for omitting to present any formal resolution upon that subject. I will state those reasons. The first, which is not stated in the report, is this: General Fry being connected with the Government and a member of the executive department, thereof, any proceeding by this House would be communicated to the President of the United States, laying the facts before him. At any rate this is the judgment of a majority of the committee. Now, sir, a communication to the President of the United States laying before him the facts in regard to this matter might now be made by the House. The committee has said in the report that this is a matter resting so peculiarly within the discretion of the House, a matter so peculiarly proper to be decided by its sense of fitness, that a mere recommendation or opinion of the committee would not be useful to the House. The committee has done everything else than simply express its opinion; I mean that it has done everything in its power toward aiding the House in coming to a just conclusion as to what it should do. The committee has reported all the facts; it has reported all the law bearing upon the facts; but it has refrained from making any recommendation as to the institution of further proceedings against General Fry.

Then there was another reason—the most potent of all—that operated upon the mind of the committee in omitting to present any further resolution. It is that the breach of the privileges of the House was committed so entirely in conjunction with the action of a member of this House that the two acts cannot be separated. The letter is written containing upon its face the evidence that it was meant to be used somewhere, and was not designed simply for the information of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] to whom it was addressed.

There were other facts which came to the knowledge of the committee. It was stated to the committee, for instance, that no complaint was made by General Fry that Mr. BLAINE had violated his confidence or wishes in presenting it to the House. These considerations induced the committee to believe his letter was written to be used in the House in the manner in which it was used by a member of the House. Therefore, sir, the committee was brought clearly up to the question, whether further proceedings could be taken against General Fry except as connected with those against a member of the House, one of them having violated the privileges of the House, and we deemed it fair and just the proceedings should be a unit against both. That, I believe, answers the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I do not wish to detain the House longer. I repeat what has been said in the report, that a more careful and more malicious and wanton violation of the privileges of the House and of its members has not been brought to the notice of any member of the committee. There is not to be found any more hurtful libel upon any member of this body in the history of its proceedings. It is due to ourselves, it is due to this body, if we are to preserve the dignity of the character of a Representative of the American people that such indignities should cease. My unwillingness to detain the House at this late period in the session does not grow out of any belief on my part that this is not an important matter. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, it is time steps were taken to stop this parade of plantation manners and ruffianism here at the center and heart of the nation where the laws are made, and where law is esteemed to be sublime and sacred in its sway. I have not spoken, because the matter has been brought so eloquently and fully to the attention of the House, on the question of privilege just disposed of. It has fully been brought to the attention of the House by the report of the committee. I am unwilling to consume the time of the House, but I am unwilling to sit down without saying the House should do this justice to my friend from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] a justice he is entitled to, having been in all of this matter in reference to which he was assailed, not only innocent, but eminently patriotic and valuable step by step to his Government at a time of imminent peril. It is due to him and the House we should call the yeas and nays expressing the judgment of the House in condemnation of this act of indignity which one of its members suffered. Unless some gentleman desires to address the House, I shall now demand the previous question.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Certainly.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that we are trying the wrong man.

If I remember the origin of this case a member of this body rose in violation of the rules of this House and of parliamentary courtesy and assailed the motives of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING;] and in justification of that assault, a few days afterward, he introduced, under the pretense of a personal explanation, a letter which he sent to the Clerk to be read.

Mr. PIKE. I do not wish to mix in this general exculpation of the gentleman from New York. But I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois, in behalf of my colleague, now absent on account of sickness, that he did not bring this letter before the House in any surreptitious way.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I did not so charge. If I remember correctly he asked to make a personal explanation.

Mr. PIKE. He did not. I presume the gentleman does not mean to do my colleague injustice.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I would not do any one injustice.

Mr. PIKE. My colleague told the House that he had such a letter, and asked to have it read. He did not rise to a personal explanation and then have this letter read.

Mr. WENTWORTH. He rose to a personal explanation.

Mr. PIKE. The record of the Globe will show that I am right. The House was fully advised by my colleague of the character of the letter when he offered it, and no objection was made to its being read. The committee seem to have fallen into the same error as the gentleman from Illinois, and thereupon censure the practice of introducing letters under the permission for personal explanation. The fact was that my colleague rose stating that he held in his hand a letter from General Fry whom he considered to have been unjustly assailed in a previous debate in the House. He asked that the letter should be read as a matter of fair play. No objection was made. The gentleman from New York consented if he could have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. CONKLING. The gentleman from Maine so far as he refers to me is mistaken. I said, simply inferring that the letter had some reference to me, although ignorant of its contents, that I would make no objection for myself, if I could have leave to reply if anything needing reply should appear. I gave no consent. I had no knowledge of what the letter was, nor was I in any respect in privy with the outrage and indecency of its being read. I simply refrained from objecting as I was as I supposed in some way referred to, and did not therefore choose to interpose objection if others did not.

Mr. PIKE. When the Speaker asked if any one objected to the introduction of the letter—and he put it twice clearly to the House—the gentleman from New York rose in his place and said he should not object.

Mr. CONKLING. I simply refrained from objecting; I did not assent.

Mr. PIKE. If the gentleman makes a distinction between assenting and not objecting, he is entitled to the benefit of the distinction. I desire merely simply to state the position of my colleague in introducing the letter.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Mr. Speaker, what I want to say is this: the chairman of the committee alluded to plantation manners. Now, plantation manners are not generally located in the North. At least it is not so generally understood. General Fry is a native of my State, and the gentleman who brought his letter before the House knew what it contained; he knew it contained an attack upon one of his fellow-members, and one of his coequals in the House; and in sending it to the Clerk's desk to be read he did it for the express purpose of responding to the gentleman from New York. And now my friend calls this plantation manners. Why, sir, these manners are up in the boreal regions—the northern part of Maine and the northern part of Illinois. General Fry was one of the first graduates of West Point from my congressional district. I take an interest in his character, and my whole State has an interest in it, not only personally, but on account of the services of his family. His father, when the war broke out, differing politically from the Administration, raised a regiment, and though he was between sixty and seventy years of age he went into the field and fought in some of the severest battles that took place during the war. His friends are numerous in our State, and as one of the Representatives of the State I would not feel justified in allowing this thing to be done, which it seems to be the intention of the House to do, without saying this much. And yet I feel that I am under no obligation to defend General Fry, although he was my own cadet, because he should have shown me that letter. I understand that he exhibited the letter to no member of the Illinois delegation. There is not a member from Illinois who would not have advised him to have kept it to himself.

But, Mr. Speaker, to revert to the original point, it does not screen a man when he wants to attack some fellow-member of the House to go to the Department, get a letter and send it to the Clerk's desk to be read. And here this report is brought in censuring him. As for the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] I am free to say, as I presume every member of the House is, that there is nothing in his conduct that is not entirely to his credit, and he has won laurels by the investigation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's five minutes have expired.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I am willing to give the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Now, Mr. Speaker, we are passing by this subject, we are passing by the gentleman who introduced this letter to censure him. Does any one suppose that the gentleman from Maine when he introduced it did not know for what purpose it was written? What testimony is before the committee that General Fry himself knew it was to come here? But so far as he is concerned that does not affect the odium attached to him for sending it here, or to others who gave it to the gentleman from Maine. But the point I object to is, that the gentleman from New York should bring down upon the head of this officer whose character has stood up to this time without reproach, one of the most gallant men we ever had in the Army, whose integrity and honor have always been sustained until this committee made this report; and now the whole of the odium of sending a letter here is to be attributed to him, when I think it belongs somewhere else.

I have several times during this session felt it to be my duty to call gentlemen to order for impugning the motives of other members. I always differed in this respect with the Chair. It would make an easy berth for the Speaker, according to his decision, that a member who had consent to make a personal explanation could go on and say what he pleased, and we would have to sit here and watch him. I am satisfied, since the Speaker delivered his recent opinion, that he is right in a parliamentary point of view. Hereafter, if anybody on this floor undertakes to make a personal attack on another, I shall feel bound to call him to order at once. Had we done this when the gentleman from Maine imputed bad motives to the gentleman from New York, we would have saved ourselves in the House all this trouble and mortification. When such a contest has once begun, it is the bounden duty of some one member to rise upon the floor and demand that it shall be stopped.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that some one will feel it to be his duty, if he knows anything against General Fry, to prefer the charges and let him be tried by the proper tribunal. If he sent that letter here, if he designed it to be sent here against a member of this House, I am willing to go as far as any other member of the House to fix the proper censure upon him. Should it appear, however, that he did not intend to have that letter presented to the House, then, so far as the prerogatives of the House are concerned, it alters the case very materially. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] if there be anything against General Fry, let charges be filed against him, and let him be tried by a military tribunal. He is out of the House; there is no one here to advocate his cause. No one knows what he has to say. We have no explanation why he sent that letter here. As he did send the letter here, I am willing, to that extent, to agree to the report of the committee. But then there is the member who had the letter read from the Clerk's desk. When he sent it up to be read he virtually indorsed it. What are we to do with him?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I demand the previous question.

Mr. PIKE. I want to say a word in behalf of my colleague.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will yield out of my time after the previous question has been seconded.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER stated that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] was entitled to an hour in which to close the debate.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois makes a valiant defense—I suppose he means it to be such—of his protégé, General Fry, by attempting to shift the whole responsibility upon my colleague.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I do not make any defense of General Fry.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman insinuates that my colleague by some wily arts induced General Fry to send that letter to be read in this House.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not say so.

Mr. PIKE. Is the gentleman authorized by General Fry or any one else to say that my colleague induced him to send that letter to this House?

Mr. WENTWORTH. I do not charge the gentleman's colleague with having done so.

Mr. PIKE. I am glad that the gentleman withdraws the charge.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I do not charge any colleague of mine in this House with anything.

Mr. PIKE. I understood the gentleman to say that my colleague induced General Fry to send this letter here.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I said I did not know what inducements were brought to bear upon General Fry to have him send this letter here.

Mr. PIKE. I can say to the gentleman, if he does not know, and I speak from a general knowledge of my colleague's character and not from having had any communication with him on the subject—I can tell him that if he investigates the subject and learns the truth he will find that his insinuations against my colleague have no foundation. He generously defends General Fry as he would any friend he deemed unjustly assailed, and General Fry furnished him this letter expressly to be read in this House as corroborating his statements in his behalf.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Have you seen General Fry?

Mr. PIKE. I have not. I have had no communication with him. I do not propose to defend him. I only speak of the part my colleague had in this transaction. As to the breach of privilege which is spoken of by some gentlemen, the House knows of the debate that occurred. My colleague had his say; the gentleman from New York had his say; which got the better of it the record will show.

The gentleman from Illinois said my colleague rose for a personal explanation and then introduced the letter, acting under pretense of his privileges. I corrected him; and now I have the Globe, which will show who was right, and it will show, too, that my colleague is not subject to the implied censure of the committee, if they mean it as a censure, when in their report they condemn the practice of members coming in here, under the color of personal explanations, and bringing in letters from other persons.

Now let me read from the Globe containing the report of the proceedings and debates of the House of the 30th of April:

"Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] yield to me a moment?"

"Mr. ELIOT. Yes, sir."

"Mr. BLAINE. I hold in my hand a letter from Provost Marshal General Fry, which I ask to have read at the Clerk's desk for the double purpose of vindicating myself from the charge of having stated in debate last week that was false, and also for the purpose, which I am sure will commend itself to the House, of allowing fair play to an honorable man in the same forum in which he has been assailed."

"The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent to have it read. Is there objection?"

"Mr. CONKLING. I infer that this has some reference to me. I shall make no objection provided I may have an opportunity to reply to whatever the letter may call for hereafter."

"Mr. STEVENS. I hope this will be postponed until we get through this bill. I object to interrupting it in this way."

It was not read then. About an hour later in the proceedings I find this:

"Mr. BLAINE. I ask to send to the Clerk's table to have read the letter the reading of which was objected to this morning."

"Mr. CONKLING. I do not object, but only ask, if the matter relates to me, to have opportunity to reply."

"Mr. BLAINE. I wish to repeat what I said before."

"Mr. ROSS. I object to the gentleman from New York making a speech."

"Mr. CONKLING. The gentleman does not want a letter to be read relating to a member and then not permit that member to reply."

"Mr. ROSS. I withdraw my objection."

"Mr. BLAINE. I want this letter read for the double purpose of vindicating myself from the charge of having made an untruthful statement on this floor, and to give, in the broad American sense, fair play and opportunity to a worthy officer to be heard in a forum where he has been assailed."

"I wish further to say that if, on investigation, I had found I was in error in the statement I had made touching the member from the Utica district of New York [Mr. CONKLING] and Provost Marshal General Fry, I would, mortifying as it would have been, apologized to the House. Whether I was in error or not I leave to those who hear the letter of the Provost Marshal General."

And thereupon the letter was read. The House can judge whether there was any invasion of its dignity, when all the members consented to have the letter read to them. Certainly my colleague did nothing but what was fair and manly. The House cannot now complain if they failed to object to the reading of what they desired to hear.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Mr. Speaker, should the resolution which my colleague from the Onondaga district gave notice of a few minutes ago be adopted we should ascertain who is the right man to be prosecuted in this case. It has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WESTWORTH] that we are pursuing the wrong man; that General Fry, when that letter was sent to Mr. BLAINE, might not have known that it was to be used in this House. Now, I do not wish to spend a moment's time over that; I desire to call the attention of the House to another subject.

Mr. PIKE. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOTCHKISS] believe that was the fact?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. That was the fact?

Mr. PIKE. That when General Fry sent that letter to my colleague [Mr. BLAINE] he, General Fry, did not expect it to be read in this House.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I have expressed no opinion upon the subject, and therefore I am not to be cross-examined upon the subject. But I would call the attention of the House to libel No. 2, which has been sent stealthily into this House and scattered around here upon the desks of members. It has been kept away from my desk. It has been stolen in here, with this notice served upon the House:

"A request made by General Fry to the investigating committee for the privilege of preparing and submitting, by himself or counsel, a written plea was not granted."

Here is an appeal to the House against the conduct of one of its committees:

"The following letter of instructions was, however, addressed by General Fry to his counsel, Hon. A. G. Riddle, on the eve of the oral plea, which Mr. Riddle made in compliance with the requirements of the committee. It gives a general but brief résumé of the grounds on which General Fry rests his charges against Mr. CONKLING, and of his defense against the charge which Mr. CONKLING incidentally brings against him."

There the attention of this House is called to this question, on an appeal from the action of their committee. He says they did not treat him fairly, and he now appeals to the House and calls their attention to this letter, and asks them to review the matter. Now, who has done that? I would like to know who is the right man for that, and whether this body has any dignity to protect. We have been lectured here this session from all quarters, until finally clerks in the Departments come here and read lectures to us, or use members of this House for that purpose. Next come in bullies and attack us, and attack the officers of this House. When will the dogs be set upon us? Such a libel as this is scattered about this House, and the attention of the House is called to it; and then General Fry says:

"I have thus briefly reviewed the charges contained in my letter. Of the principal charges, I maintain and reassert not only the substantial but the literal correctness."

A more impudent, a more insolent, a more detestable libel never was presented to the House. It is in defiance of the committee and in defiance of the judgment of the House. It says in substance, "I will insult you, no matter what you say, no matter what you do, no matter what the report of your committee may be."

The SPEAKER. The five minutes of the gentlemen have expired.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I desire to say only a few words more.

Mr. Speaker, if this matter should be referred to the Judiciary Committee as a matter of law, the special committee having found all the facts, and this last libel being before us, that committee will be enabled to ascertain who the "right man" is; and by and by we shall be able to find some one whom we may be able to bring into this House, that the Speaker may talk to him and persuade him, perhaps, that he really has been in the wrong in trampling upon the dignity of the American Congress, by insulting us, by treating us as no man would dare to treat a common pettifogger in a decent justice's court. By and by we shall rise, perhaps, to sufficient dignity to resent an insult.

Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested here by an honorable member that if a bureau of this Government—a bureau reeking with corruption, a stench in the nostrils of the people—comes in here and asks for a continuance of public confidence and public favor, that it be incorporated in a new law, perhaps ingrafted upon the Constitution by way of amendment, no member here has a right to rise and say anything about the man who administers that bureau. No matter how corrupt his conduct may have been, our mouths must be closed, or else when we approach the door of this Hall ruffians may pounce upon us; or we may be libeled by newspaper correspondents; it may be heralded all over the country that this or that member has violated the Constitution and the law, and has disgraced himself.

The hirelings of the press throughout the country have been busy libeling my colleague ever since this infamous slander was read here, the attacks emanating from this city, the press being shamelessly prostituted for the purpose of traducing him. I have told him to wait in silence till the day of reckoning should come. Now I want to have the verdict of this House proclaimed throughout the Union.

There is one more point to which I wish to call attention. This investigation has been conducted by a committee who have become acquainted with the question. I hope the subject may not be taken out of their hands and referred to the Executive for his action.

The Executive should hear the whole story when it is told. We have scarcely begun in this matter. General Fry has not been tried.

We tried Mr. CONKLING. We have, so far as we have been permitted, shown General Fry's motive in writing this libel, but have gone no further. This committee should be continued to investigate the whole case. They should go on "in this line if it takes all summer."

Mr. Speaker, I had no idea of saying a word on this subject; but when it is suggested that a Representative on this floor has no right to speak his mind independently on questions of public interest, matters of legislation, I desire to know whether that is the rule or not. If he is to be tongue-tied here I would rather not hold a position in this House.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I now ask that the vote be taken.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Preliminary to the question, I desire to say a word or two. I have not had time to read this report, nor do I wish in any manner to enter into the personal matters to which it relates; but I want to know of the chairman whether this committee in their report justify the taking of employment by a member of Congress who is in receipt of his salary as a member of Congress and taking payment for such employment in addition to his emoluments as a member of Congress. I want to know whether the committee, irrespective of the parties involved in this case, justify that or not.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The committee find in their report that a member of Congress who is qualified as such shall not hold any other office or receive any compensation therefor. They find that a member of Congress, after the 4th of March, the day on which his pay commences under the law, cannot receive the salary of any other office during that time. A member of Congress may be employed by the Government as counsel, and such employment may be competently performed; and that is what occurred in this case.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Then I understand the gentleman to say he believes a member of Congress, subsequent to the 4th of March and prior to the expiration of his term, can be employed by the Government in another capacity and receive compensation therefor.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. That is what the committee find on the subject, if the employment is not an office.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Can he be employed against the Government?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. In favor of the Government he may be employed; against the Government he cannot be employed, because there is a statute of 1864 which expressly provides in this identical case of Mr. CONKLING, that is to say, it provides no member of Congress shall be permitted to be employed by any person in any proceeding before a court-martial, furnishing a complete legislative determination that he may be employed in that identical case on the other side, because the provision of 1864, in saying that a member of Congress may not be employed by any other person, would imply that he may be employed in that identical case by the Government itself.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. That is a fine distinction—a distinction without a difference. If it be not a violation of the letter of the law, it is to my mind a violation of its spirit.

Mr. STEVENS. Suppose a man had an action of ejectment against the Government in Philadelphia and came to my colleague to employ him, would he think himself barred?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I am not a member of the bar and therefore I should be barred. [Laughter.] I will answer my colleague that I do not think it would be proper for me while receiving pay as a member of Congress to be employed against the Government I was sent here to represent.

Mr. STEVENS. Last September parties came to me to represent them in a suit in reference to the internal revenue. They made it worth my while; that is, I suppose, paying my expenses. [Laughter.] I did so and defeated the Government, by which it is compelled to refund some six or seven thousand dollars. I owe an apology to the country for having done justice to these parties.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. That is a matter about which I have no concern.

Mr. SHELLABARGER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 4, not voting 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Davis, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Marston, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Stevens, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, John L. Thomas, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—96.

NAYS—Messrs. Bromwell, Ross, Thornton, and Wentworth—4.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, Le Blond, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, Moulton, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Rousseau, Schenck, Scofield, Shaukin, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stillwell, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, Winfield, and Wright—82.

So the resolutions were adopted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WENTWORTH said: While I concur in so much of the report as relates to the gentleman from New York, in other respects I cannot concur in it for the reasons I have stated, and I therefore vote "no."

The vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. SHELLABARGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to a question of privilege. I offer the following resolution and demand the previous question upon it:

Whereas on the 30th of April a letter purporting to be written by General Fry was read in this House, together with sundry documents accompanying it, which letter was grossly libelous and reflected upon the public and private character of a member; and whereas the House having ordered an inquiry as to said letter and its truth or falsity; and whereas for that purpose a select committee was raised, which committee has ascertained and reported said letter to have been false and malicious: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire and report whether any breach of the privileges of the House not sufficiently reported upon by said select committee has been committed in connection with writing or sending said letter, the documents accompanying the same, or the introduction thereof into the House, or causing the same to be read in the House, or entered upon the record of the House, or making the same public, and if so, by whom, and what action, if any, should be taken; and that said committee also inquire and report whether said libel has been republished or renewed by the said General Fry or any other person since the termination of the session of said committee, and if so, by whom, and whether any and what action ought to be had thereon; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman claims this to be a question of privilege. The Chair will submit to the House whether it is a question of privilege.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest that the gentleman modify it so as to refer the subject to the same committee that has had this matter under consideration heretofore. I see no necessity for taking it out of the jurisdiction of that committee and referring it to another. I am satisfied that the House has entire confidence in the ability and integrity of that committee.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is this debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is scarcely debatable. It is a question which must be decided by the House exactly as the Chair decides a question of privilege, upon the presentation of the resolution itself.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to say that I have no objection to this going to the special committee, though I preferred it should go to the Judiciary Committee. I am entirely willing to modify it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I withdraw any objection.

Mr. PIKE. My colleague, I know, would not object to the fullest investigation.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I did not hear the resolution read, but I understand it to relate to the question whether in the conduct of the gentleman from Maine there was anything that constituted a breach of the rules or privileges of the House. Now, that is a question for the Committee on Rules, and I beg that the resolution may take that direction, for no member of the select committee, that I am aware of, professes to be familiar with the rules of this body.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire not to reflect upon the character of any member whatever. I have not introduced the resolution from any personal feeling toward any member of the House. But I desire to know what constitutes and what does not constitute a breach of the privileges of the House.

Mr. RADFORD. I object to further debate.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman allow a statement to be made?

Mr. RADFORD. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The only subject to be referred to the Committee on Rules is a proposition to amend the rules.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I will insist upon the previous motion to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit to the House whether this is a question of privilege.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 24, noes 71.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had concurred in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the resolution of the House providing for the appointment of a joint committee on retrenchment.

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 428) for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in Portland, Maine, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, after to-morrow.

Mr. SPALDING. I demand the regular order of business.

ADMISSION OF TENNESSEE.

Mr. BINGHAM. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which House joint resolution No. 83, concerning the State of Tennessee, was recommitted to the committee on reconstruction.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whereas the people of Tennessee have made known to the Congress of the United States their desire that the constitutional relations heretofore existing between them and the United States may be fully established, and did, on the 22d day of February, 1865, by a large popular vote, adopt and ratify a constitution of government, republican in form and not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and a State government has been organized under the provisions thereof, which said provisions, and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, proclaim and denote loyalty to the Union; and whereas the people of Tennessee are found to be in a condition to exercise the functions of a State within this Union, and can only exercise the same by the consent of the law-making power of the United States: Therefore, the State of Tennessee is hereby declared to be one of the United States of America, on an equal footing with the other States, upon the express condition that the people of Tennessee will maintain and enforce, in good faith, their existing constitutions and laws, excluding those who have been engaged in rebellion against the United States from the exercise of the elective franchise, for the respective periods of time therein provided for, and shall exclude the same persons for the like respective periods of time from eligibility to office; and the State of Tennessee shall never assume or pay any debt or obligation contracted or incurred in aid of the late rebellion; nor shall said State ever, in any manner, claim from the United States or make any allowance or compensation for slaves emancipated or liberated in any way whatever; which conditions shall be ratified by the Legislature of Tennessee, or the people thereof, as the Legislature may direct, before this act shall take effect.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. BINGHAM. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LYNCH moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ECKLEY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 69, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Eliot, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Koontz, Loan, McClurg, McRuer, Mercer, Morrill, Moulton, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Plants, Price, John H. Rice, Ritter, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shaukin, Shellabarger, Stevens, Strouse, Taylor, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—59.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Hale, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Johnson, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Longyear, Marston, McKee, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, Newell, Nicholson, Noel, Orth, Phelps, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Taber, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whaley, and Woodbridge—69.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bundy, Chanler, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Farnsworth, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, Kasson, Kelso, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, Niblack, Patterson, Pomeroy, Rogers, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stillwell, Francis Thomas, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, Winfield, and Wright—44.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question then recurred on laying the motion to reconsider on the table; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 31, nays 92, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Benjamin, Boutwell, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Eliot, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Jencks, Kelley, Loan, Lynch, McClurg, Mercer, Morrill, Moulton, Paine, Perham, Price, Sawyer, Schenck, Stevens, Trowbridge, Ward, Wentworth, Williams, and James F. Wilson—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Hale, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Johnson, Julian, Kerr, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Longyear, Marston, McKee, McRuer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, O'Neill, Orth, Phelps, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Scofield, Shaukin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—92.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, James M. Ashley,

Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Brantledge, Bromwell, Bundy, Chanler, Cook, Culloom, Culver, Darling, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Farnsworth, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Jones, Kasson, Kelso, Kuykendall, Le Blond, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, Patterson, Plants, Pomeroy, Rogers, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Francis Thomas, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Elihu B. Washburne, Winfield, and Wright—59.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

During the roll-call,
Mr. ALLISON said: I would inquire of the Chair if the joint committee on reconstruction is not authorized to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above.

The question recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. RITTER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. RITTER. I ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. GRIDER, for the remainder of the session.

Leave was granted.

PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S BUREAU.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I ask consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House twenty thousand extra copies of the report relative to General Fry, without the testimony.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions two pension bills.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. BAKER. I ask my colleague [Mr. ROSS] to withdraw his objection. One of these cases is that of a soldier who is stone-blind and dependent.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to anything until the Representatives from Tennessee are admitted to their seats.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. R. No. 300) for the payment of the public debt, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. STEVENS. I now renew the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 53, noes 63.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. STEVENS called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 49, nays 71, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Baxter, Benjamin, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Eliot, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Kelley, Loan, Lynch, McClurg, McKuer, Mercier, Morrill, Moulton, Price, John H. Rice, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Stevens, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Ward, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—49.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Banks, Bingham, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Davis, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Johnson, Kerr, Ketchum, Koontz, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Longyear, Marston, McKee, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, O'Neill, Orth, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whaley, and Woodbridge—71.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Ancona, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Brantledge, Bromwell, Bundy, Chanler, Cook, Culloom, Culver, Darling, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Farnsworth, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Kuykendall, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Plants, Pomeroy, Rogers, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Francis Thomas, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Elihu B. Washburne, Winfield, and Wright—62.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. PAINE, said: I am paired with Mr. HALE on this and similar questions. If he were here he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was stated as above recorded.

TENNESSEE—AGAIN.

The question recurred upon seconding the call for the previous question on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution in relation to Tennessee was recommitted to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 71, noes 41.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was upon ordering the main question to be now put.

Mr. ALLISON. I call for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 54, noes 56.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. BENJAMIN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 46, nays 68, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Baker, Baxter, Benjamin, Boutwell, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Davis, Driggs, Eliot, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Loan, Lynch, McClurg, McKuer, Mercier, Morrill, Moulton, Perham, Price, John H. Rice, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Stevens, Taylor, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Ward, Welker, Wentworth, and James F. Wilson—46.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Ketchum, Koontz, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Longyear, Marston, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, O'Neill, Orth, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Strouse, Taber, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Whaley, and Woodbridge—68.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Brantledge, Bromwell, Bundy, Chanler, Cook, Culloom, Culver, Darling, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Farnsworth, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Kuykendall, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, Paine, Patterson, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Rogers, Rousseau, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—68.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question recurred on ordering the main question to be put, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 71, nays 34, not voting 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Conkling, Davis, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Johnson, Kerr, Ketchum, Koontz, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Marshall, Marston, McKuer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, O'Neill, Orth, Phelps, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, and Whaley—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Baker, Baxter, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Driggs, Eliot, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Loan, Lynch, McClurg, Mercier, Morrill, Moulton, Perham, Sawyer, Stevens, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Ward, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—34.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Brantledge, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Culloom, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Farnsworth, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Kuykendall, Longyear, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, Paine, Patterson, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Rogers, Rousseau, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—77.

So the main question was ordered, which was on reconsidering the vote by which the joint resolution had been recommitted to the committee on reconstruction.

Mr. SPALDING, (at five o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope that the motion to reconsider will be agreed to, so that I may offer a substitute for the original bill, have the substitute ordered to be printed, and call the previous question. Then the House can adjourn, and this question will come up in the morning as unfinished business.

Mr. WARD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he intends to press this bill to a vote to-night.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the arrangement I have suggested be agreed to, I do not; otherwise I do.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he intends to allow any debate upon this proposition, or to permit any amendment to be offered.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no objection to hearing the gentleman's argument in the morning; but I prefer that the previous question shall be called this evening.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to know whether the preamble has been sufficiently sugar-coated for the majority of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I leave that to be decided by the House when the vote shall be taken.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Ohio. We on this side have stood by him upon principle in bringing up this matter; and I hope that when we reach a point where the vote can be taken, the gentleman will not consent that the House shall adjourn. We will stand by him clear through. Let us have Tennessee in.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] moves that the House adjourn.

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I renew it.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 61.

Mr. PRICE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 63, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Baker, Baxter, Boutwell, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Jenckes, Kelley, Loan, Lynch, McClurg, Mercier, Morrill, Moulton, Perham, Price, John H. Rice, Ritter, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Stevens, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—43.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Davis, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Kerr, Ketcham, Koontz, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Marston, McRuer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Neill, O'Neill, Orth, Phelps, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, and Whaley—63.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Ancona, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Broomwell, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Garfield, Gloss-brenner, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Demas Hubbard, Edwin H. Hubbell, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Kuykendall, Longyear, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, Paine, Patterson, Plants, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Rogers, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, John L. Thomas, Upson, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—76.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question then recurred on the motion to reconsider.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 27.

So the House reconsidered the vote by which the joint resolution was recommitted to the committee on reconstruction.

The question then recurred on the motion to recommit.

Mr. BINGHAM withdrew the motion to recommit, and moved the following substitute for the joint resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Joint resolution declaring Tennessee again entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Whereas the State of Tennessee has in good faith ratified the article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the Legislatures of the several States, and has shown otherwise, to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to her due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Tennessee is hereby declared to be restored to her former, proper, practical relation to the Union, and again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress, duly elected and qualified, upon their taking the oaths of office required by existing laws.

And then, on motion of Mr. JENCKES, (at fifty-five minutes past five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the table and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of soldiers of the war of 1812, asking for pension without regard to time of service.

By Mr. HOTCHKISS: The petition of Jonathan Smoke, to be placed on the pension-roll.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 20, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented the memorial of Jacob T. Smith, who served in the corps of sappers and miners, under the command of Lieutenant G. W. Smith, in the war with Mexico, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a memorial of the Citizens' Association of New York, remonstrating against the provisions of the internal revenue law which permit city railroad companies to add one cent to their rate, or to issue tickets covering the exact amount of the tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COWAN presented the memorial of Ward B. Burnett, late surveyor general of Kansas and Nebraska, praying to be reimbursed for expenses incurred by him in a journey to Washington city to repel certain charges made against him in his official capacity; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL presented a memorial of the butchers, provision dealers, and other stall-holders of the Center market, in the city of Washington, praying for a charter to empower them in the form of a joint stock company to erect new and suitable buildings in the place of those now occupied as a market-house; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. WILSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 138) to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States; which was received informally and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 520) for the relief of Elisha J. House, assessor of internal revenue for the second district of Michigan, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 178) in reference to the Dismal Swamp Canal Company, reported it without amendment.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 589) for the relief of Delia A. Jacobs, late Delia A. Fitzgerald, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 780) to protect the revenue, and for other purposes, have directed me to report it with two amendments. As there are only two amendments reported, it is quite unnecessary to have the bill reprinted with the amendments. I shall call it up presently. The amendments are very simple and it is unnecessary to print them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The customary order to print will be withheld.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. FESSENDEN. While I am up I wish to make an explanation which, perhaps, may be due to one of the officers of the Senate. I have received a letter from the Secretary of the Senate indorsing in very decided terms the integrity and capacity of Mr. Jones, the messenger who is the superintendent of the stationery room. I wish to say that in the remarks I made the other day I did not mean to be understood in the slightest degree as impugning the integrity or the faithfulness of Mr. Jones, the superintendent of that room. I remembered that when Mr. Clubb was there he was always to be found at his post as superintendent of the room, and was always there himself, personally supervising everything that was done in the room. Whether he had any assistant I do not now recollect. But I have observed recently that the gentleman who receives the pay of superintendent of that room and makes purchases, &c., does not, so far as my observation is concerned, personally supervise it, so far as the delivery of the articles is concerned. I do not know that it is necessary. I stated the fact. Whether the present system is the proper one or not is for the Committee on Contingent Expenses to decide; but in the remarks that I made with regard to the stationery I did not have reference to Mr. Jones, the superintendent of the room. Under our rule, every Senator can take what he pleases; it is left to his own sense of propriety and personal honor; and the superintendent can exercise no discretion about it. He can only deliver it when called for by Senators and others entitled to call according to their own statement of the necessities of their office, whatever that may be; and, therefore, what I said with reference to the abuses which I supposed to exist had no reference whatever to the conduct of the superintendent, as I know nothing against it, and presume it to be perfectly correct and honest in all particulars, but applied to the system itself, which is liable to great abuses, and which I am satisfied has been subject to great abuses, not on the part of the superintendent, who has no will in the matter, but on the part of others, who ought to exercise a different discretion from what they do with relation to the power given under the rule itself.

I make this explanation in justice to Mr. Jones, he being an officer of the Senate against whom I know nothing, and who I believe to be devoted to his duties under the Secretary, and such as the Secretary assigns him, as much as any other man. I have nothing against him whatever, and therefore regret to have been understood as imputing anything wrongly to him. I had no occasion to make any such imputation.

MARGARETTE ANN LAURIE.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Margarette Ann Laurie, for property destroyed in the District of Columbia, have instructed me to report a bill granting her pay for rent contracted to be paid for her premises, but without any compensation for property destroyed. This is a bill that should have been reported the other evening when we had a special meeting to consider reports from the Committee on Claims, and was not reported by accident. I therefore ask the indulgence of the Senate to consider it at this time. There can be no objection to this bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 441) for the relief of Margarette Ann Laurie was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to her of $2,700, in full, for rent of her house and lot, situated in Washington, and used by the military authorities from June 30, 1862, to July 1, 1865.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a report accompanying it, but perhaps I can explain the case in less time than the reading of the report would occupy. This bill proposes to pay for the rent of premises taken by order of the military authorities and occupied by the first Rhode Island regiment at the commencement of the war. They took possession of this lady's house and farm, and made a contract to pay seventy-five dollars a month rent. The soldiers there, as might naturally be supposed, destroyed a great amount of property, and she brings in a petition claiming pay for the destruction of property and for the rent. The committee have made no allowance for the destruction of property, not because they did not think it ought to be made, for the estimate was made to us by a master builder who was sent out by order of the committee to report, but because we feared it would not go through the House, and the woman is in such distress that she would rather have half what she is entitled to now than the whole by and by. We thought, therefore, we would only report what there can be no question about.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEES OF CONFERENCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In compliance with the order of the Senate directing the Chair to appoint a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 692) increasing the pensions of widows and orphans, and for other purposes, the Chair announces the appointment of Mr. LASE, Mr. VAN WINKLE, and Mr. DAVIS.

Under a like order, on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 101) for the relief of certain officers of the Army, the Chair announces the appointment of Mr. RAMSEY, Mr. COWAN, and Mr. SPRAGUE, as the committee of conference.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION LAWS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In behalf of the committee of conference on House bill No. 477, I submit a report.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 477) further to provide for the safety of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, to regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives agree to the first, second, third, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, and twenty-first amendments, as made by the Senate.

That the Senate recede from the fourth amendment, with a modification of the clause, as follows: strike out all after the word "under," in line ten, section two, and insert in place thereof the words "any circumstances;" and that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from the eighteenth and nineteenth amendments.

That the House agree to the twentieth amendment, with an amendment as follows: after the words "for the district of Portland, Oregon, $700" insert as follows: "to the supervising inspector of the Pacific coast, $2,500; to other supervising inspectors, $2,000 each;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Z. CHANDLER,
GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
J. W. NESMITH,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

CHARLES O'NEILL,
D. C. McRUER,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

MRS. ELEANOR C. RANSOM.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 709) for the relief of Mrs. Eleanor C. Ransom, have directed me to report it back with an amendment; and I ask the indulgence of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill. It is a very small bill in favor of a needy woman; it is a House bill, and the amount appropriated by the House has been reduced by the Committee on Claims of the Senate. I presume there can be no opposition to the bill, and I should like to have it considered at this time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mrs. Eleanor C. Ransom the sum of $500, to indemnify her for losses sustained by the sinking of the steamship North America, on the 22d of December, 1864, and during her voyage from New Orleans to New York, she having been ordered on board the vessel to nurse and care for sick and wounded soldiers of the United States during the voyage.

The Committee on Claims reported the bill with an amendment to strike out all of the bill after the word "appropriated," in line four, and to insert:

The sum of $400 to compensate her for services performed by her in taking care of the sick and wounded soldiers of the United States on the steamship North America on her voyage from New Orleans to New York, in December, 1864.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate and the amendment was concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

SMITHSONIAN GROUNDS WATCHMEN.

Mr. BROWN. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 159) authorizing the Commissioner of Public Buildings to employ three additional watchmen in the Smithsonian grounds, to report it back without amendment; and as it is a resolution to which I presume no objection will be offered, and as it is desirable that it should be acted on, I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POLAND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 442) to prevent courts being used as instruments of persecution against loyal persons; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 137) authorizing special juries in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DITCHES, ETC., IN PACIFIC STATES.

Mr. STEWART. I move to take up for consideration House bill No. 365.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 365) granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands in the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. This bill, after being considered by the Senate, was recommended to the Committee on Public Lands, who have reported an amendment as a substitute for the original bill. I suppose that the original bill need not be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the original bill will be omitted unless some Senator asks for its reading.

Mr. CONNESS. I believe the substitute is every word a bill which was passed by the Senate a few weeks ago.

Mr. STEWART. And fully discussed.

Mr. CONNESS. There is no amendment to it, I believe.

Mr. STEWART. None.

Mr. CONNESS. That being the case, perhaps it will not be necessary to read it.

Mr. GRIMES. We do not know what it is.

Mr. STEWART. If there is no objection, I move that the reading of the substitute be dispensed with.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, no; let it be read.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be inserted by the Committee on Public Lands in lieu of the original bill, after the enacting clause, as follows:

That the mineral lands of the public domain, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and occupation by all citizens of the United States, and those who have declared their intention to become citizens, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law, and subject also to the local custom or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same may not be in conflict with the laws of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever any person or association of persons claim a vein or lode of quartz, or other rock in place, bearing gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper, having previously occupied and improved the same according to the local custom or rules of miners in the district where the same is situated, and having expended in actual labor and improvements thereon an amount of not less than $1,000, and in regard to whose possession there is no controversy or opposing claim, it shall and may be lawful for said claimant or association of claimants to file in the local land office a diagram of the same, so extended laterally or otherwise as to conform to the local laws, customs, and rules of miners, and to enter such tract and receive a patent therefor, granting such mine, together with the right to follow such vein or lode with its dips, angles, and variations, to any depth, although it may enter the land adjoining, which land adjoining shall be sold subject to this condition.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That upon the filing of the diagram as provided in the second section of this act, and posting the same in a conspicuous place on the claim, together with a notice of intention to apply for a patent, the register of the land office shall publish a notice of the same in a newspaper published nearest to the location of said claim, and shall also post such notice in his office for the period of ninety days; and after the expiration of said period, if no adverse claim shall have been filed, it shall be the duty of the surveyor general, upon application of the party, to survey the premises and make a plat thereof, indorsed with his approval, designating the number and description of the location, the value of the labor and improvements, and the character of the vein exposed; and upon the payment to the proper officer of five dollars per acre, together with the cost of such survey, plat, and notice, and giving satisfactory evidence that said diagram and notice have been posted on the claim during said period of ninety days, the register of the land office shall transmit to the General Land Office said plat, survey, and description; and a patent shall issue for the same thereupon. But said plat, survey, or description shall in no case cover more than one vein or lode, and no patent shall issue for more than one vein or lode, which shall be expressed in the patent issued.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That when such location and entry of a mine shall be upon unsurveyed lands, it shall and may be lawful, after the extension thereto of the public surveys, to adjust the surveys to the limits of the premises according to the location and possession and plat aforesaid, and the surveyor general may, in extending the surveys, vary the same from a rectangular form to suit the circumstances of the country and the local rules, laws, and customs of miners: Provided, That no location hereafter made shall exceed two hundred feet in length along the vein for each locator, with an additional claim for discovery to the discoverer of the lode, with the right to follow such vein to any depth, with all its dips, variations and angles, together with a reasonable quantity of surface for the convenient working of the same as fixed by local rules: And provided further, That no person may make more than one location on the same lode, and not more than three thousand feet shall be taken in any one claim by any association of persons.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That as a further condition of sale, in the absence of necessary legislation by Congress, the local Legislature of any State or Territory may provide rules for working mines, involving easements, drainage, and other necessary means to their complete development; and those conditions shall be fully expressed in the patent.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That whenever any adverse claimants to any mine located and claimed as aforesaid shall appear before the approval of the survey, as provided in the third section of this act, all proceedings shall be stayed until a final settlement and adjudication in the courts of competent jurisdiction of the right of possession to such claim, when a patent may issue as in other cases.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to establish additional land districts and to appoint the necessary officers under existing laws, wherever he may deem the same necessary for the public convenience in executing the provisions of this act.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the right of way for the construction of highways over public land, not reserved for public uses, is hereby granted.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever, by priority of possession, rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes, have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same; and the right of way for the construction of ditches and canals for the purposes aforesaid is hereby acknowledged and confirmed: Provided, however, That whenever, after the passage of this act, any person or persons shall, in the construction of any ditch or canal, injure or damage the possession of any settler on the public domain, the party committing such injury or damage shall be liable to the party injured for such injury or damage.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That wherever, prior to the passage of this act, upon the lands heretofore designated as mineral lands, which have been excluded from survey and sale, there have been homesteads made by citizens of the United States, or persons who have declared their intention to become citizens, which homesteads have been made, improved, and used for agricultural purposes, and upon which there have been no valuable mines of gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper discovered, and which are properly agricultural lands, the said settlers or owners of such homesteads shall have a right of preemption thereto, and shall be entitled to purchase the same at the price of $1 25 per acre, and in quantity not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres; or said parties may avail themselves of the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 20, 1862, entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," and acts amendatory thereof.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That upon the survey of the lands aforesaid, the Secretary of the Interior may designate and set apart such portions of the said lands as are clearly agricultural lands, which lands shall hereafter be subject to preemption and sale as other public lands of the United States, and subject to all the laws and regulations applicable to the same.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is the question on the whole of that subject?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on what has been read as a substitute in lieu of the original bill after the enacting clause.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As I understand it, if a man has a claim and opens a vein, it is provided that he may follow it on to any adjoining land which he does not own or claim. Suppose somebody else owns the adjoining land, how is it to be worked then?

Mr. CONNESS. The adjoining land is bought subject to that easement. That is the law now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then if we sell a man a piece of land he may go under any adjoining land of the United States that he pleases.

Mr. CONNESS. The ordinary lands of the United States, not mineral, are sold according to what is called the rectangular system of survey, and always sold by perpendicular lines to the center of the earth. The necessity of varying that law in the sale of vein mines arises because all veins dip at a certain angle, varying frequently, but they always dip at an angle, never entering the earth vertically, and so they run in layers one after the other. This bill in that respect simply conforms to what is both the custom and the law now—the old custom of the Mexican miners, adopted by our own people, and sustained by the decisions of our courts. Every man now has the right to follow his vein.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But the lands belong to the United States.

Mr. CONNESS. You cannot sell the lands for mining purposes in any other way. The provision is simply that the lands in the mining regions shall be purchased subject to that condition; so that where one man has the right to follow into the land of another to the depth say of a thousand feet from the surface of the earth that other man has the same right to follow his vein on his neighbor's land. The land is bought running in slanting or oblique lines into the surface of the earth in place of perpendicular lines. That is all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not understand how you are to work it. One man says he wants to work on his own land—

Mr. CONNESS. This is what is done now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can conceive a reason why it is done now—because the lands belong to the United States, and if a man opens a vein he may follow it wherever he pleases; he has the same authority to go to the next adjoining piece of land that he has to occupy the place where he is; it is not surveyed yet. But suppose another man buys the adjoining piece of land, will you give his neighbor the right to go right under him?

Mr. CONNESS. As to agricultural land, the purchaser would buy and own by perpendicular lines; but that rule cannot apply to a piece of mining land. One man has a claim and another man alongside of him has a corresponding claim. They each follow their lodes. Notwithstanding they have a complete title by possession to the surface, they also, by possession, by common consent, by the common law, sustained by the courts, if a vein dips at a certain depth into the adjoining land, have the right to follow it, and they do follow it. The perfection of this bill in that respect is, that it conforms to existing rights of property.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There cannot be any existing rights of property, because none of them have any property in the land.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator will allow me, I think I can illustrate the matter so that it will be understood.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I understand it; but the difficulty is that I do not see the propriety of it.

Mr. STEWART. Here are parallel veins, pitching, say, at an angle of forty-five degrees, one after another. If you sell in square sections with perpendicular lines extending into the earth, any quantity you please, one man may have a piece of half a dozen veins and yet have no vein to work. To open a silver vein costs all the way from fifty thousand to several million dollars, and to work it requires long tunneling, and it requires a system of timbering from the top. If a man has only a short piece, and is required to go into the earth by perpendicular lines, he might cut through several veins, but no system of working could be adopted. The veins are separated by rock walls, so that there is no possibility of confusion. You give a man a vein, or so many feet running with the vein and following it down. Suppose, for instance, you give a man three thousand feet. It dips forty-five degrees. If you were to undertake to give him that by your present system of selling the land by perpendicular lines, what would be the result? In order to work that vein he must have a large quantity of ground. It is supposed that the veins ordinarily have been worked down three thousand feet. Then you would have to give him an extent of three thousand feet laterally. In these three thousand feet there might be twenty or thirty other veins; so that under that system, in order to give him one vein you would have to give him a complete monopoly of a whole district, or you would give it to him in a shape that he could not do anything. The practical necessity of the case requires that the dips of the veins shall be followed. A vein is an expensive thing to work, and any other system of sale would destroy the whole country; and that is the principal reason why the miners have been objecting to sales, because the perpendicular lines would cut up their claims and no man would purchase. If you undertake to divide the lands in the mining country by having the lines extend perpendicularly, mining will be effectually at an end. That is the reason why the people there have been excited and alarmed by projects for the sale of the mining lands. This bill, however, has been out there, has been submitted to the people, and meets with universal approbation. We so understand from letters and by every newspaper we receive, and there are many mining journals in California and Nevada, and every one of them has indorsed it, because it allows the miners to work the mines. There has been a misunderstanding between them and persons here in regard to the whole matter, they supposing that we here intended to divide the country in such a manner that they could not work the mines. The bills introduced had been of that character, and that is what created the excitement.

I will say further, that the introduction of those bills has depreciated the whole mining country, and has undoubtedly prevented the production of fifty millions of money, because no man would invest his money in opening a silver mine with a prospect of having it cut at right angles after he had spent several hundred thousand dollars in opening it.

Mr. CONNESS. The matter may be explained further and perhaps made a little plainer by continuing the idea expressed by the Senator from Nevada, that these veins are always encased in walls of rock resembling the width of a ribbon, we will say, or any given width; and those walls that incase the vein continue right down, so that when one man goes under another man's ground he has not a right by this bill to go all through it and around it and under it. He does not interfere with his neighbor's property in any respect. He simply follows the regular dip or slant of his vein, not affecting his neighbor in any manner whatever.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I understand it. I would inquire whether there is any limitation as to the amount that any one man can purchase.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is it limited to?

Mr. CONNESS. Any one man cannot claim more than three hundred feet on a lode.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Three hundred feet on the surface?

Mr. CONNESS. Three hundred feet in the length of the lode, not three hundred feet in the width; but as much land on either side of that lode as is necessary to carry on his operations, which is determined by the local law.

Mr. STEWART. By the situation of the vein.

Mr. CONNESS. That part of it is very strictly guarded. This is the same bill which we passed a short time since, without the alteration of a line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEWART, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands, and for other purposes."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 261) making appropri-tions for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill (S. No. 123) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific railroad, in California, to Portland, in Oregon, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 234) to incorporate the National Capital Insurance Company, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had appointed the following as the joint select committee on retrenchment on the part of the House: Messrs. ROBERT S. HALE of New York, ROBERT C. SCHENCK of Ohio, THOMAS A. JENCKES of Rhode Island, SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, and JOHN L. THOMAS of Maryland.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 3) to revive the grade of General in the United States Army; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 261) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, as follows to their respective Houses:

That the Senate recede from their amendment numbered one, and agree to the same with an amendment substituting the word "fifty" in lieu of "forty" in line seven, page 2, of the bill; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their amendment numbered two, and agree to the same with an amendment substituting the words "sixty-five" in lieu of "fifty" in line eight, page 2; and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered fourteen, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: strike out of said amendment all after the words "Department of State" and insert in lieu thereof, "and also an examiner of claims for the same Department whose salary shall be $3,000 per annum; and the salary of the second Assistant Secretary of State shall be $3,500 per annum, and such sums are hereby appropriated."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered fifteen, and agree to the same amended as follows: strike out the words "than $3,000 in any one year," and substitute as follows: "than $2,500 in any one year over and above the expenses of office rent and clerk hire, to be approved by the Secretary of State, of which returns shall be made to the Secretary of the Treasury;" and the Senate agree to the same, so amended.

That the House recede from their amendment to the amendment of the Senate numbered nine, and strike out the whole of it and substitute in lieu thereof as follows: "and no money shall be paid to the present minister resident at Portugal, out of any fund whatever, on account of further services in his office;" and also strike out the word "Portugal," on page 1, line ten, of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same, so amended.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to their amendment numbered six, and agree to the same.

CHARLES SUMNER,
JAMES W. GRIMES,
LYMAN TRUMBULL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
R. P. SPALDING,
N. P. BANKS,
JOHN WENTWORTH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask the member from Massachusetts whether by this report the mission to Portugal is abolished, or whether the pay has been taken away from the present incumbent as proposed by the House.

Mr. SUMNER. The pay has been taken away from the present incumbent, and there is no appropriation for the coming year.

Mr. JOHNSON. That seems to me to be rather singular. An appropriation has been made for that officer from the first. If there is any objection to the particular officer, I suppose the Executive ought to remove him:

out to have a minister there and not to pay him seems to me to be singular.

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator ask for any explanation?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir; I should like to know what it is.

Mr. SUMNER. The original proposition came from the House, and in its first form it was that the mission should be abolished. When the committee of conference came together it was evident from what was said that in that proposition the House were firm; they were determined not to yield, and it was impossible for us to proceed in our conference until we had entertained that proposition. The result of further discussion was that the proposition was modified in the form in which it is now reported. Instead of undertaking to abolish the mission, the appropriation for the coming year for the mission was taken out, and there was an express provision to the effect that the present incumbent should not be paid for any further services out of any fund whatever. If the Senator wishes to know why that was done, I shall not go into any statement, but shall content myself, if the Senator requires it, by sending to the Chair a letter from Mr. Seward, covering a letter, which has been printed, from the present minister to Portugal. That correspondence discloses the origin of the determination on the part of the House, and to which the committee on the part of the Senate finally yielded.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no desire to have the letter read. I have seen nearly the whole letter, or portions of the letter, printed; but I supposed that that letter was intended to be a private letter.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Secretary of State explains that. Let us hear his explanation.

Mr. GRIMES. Let the letter of the Secretary of State be read.

Mr. SUMNER. The letter of the Secretary of State perhaps had better be read. It will appear from that that the letter of Mr. Harvey was printed at the request of the President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, June 19, 1866.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive the letter which, as secretary of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, you addressed to me on the 15th instant, and in which you communicate a resolution of the committee, "that the Secretary of State be requested to furnish this committee with a copy of a letter from Mr. Harvey, minister at Portugal, said to have been addressed to the Department of State, and published in one of the New York papers some five or six weeks since, which had special reference to the action of Congress."

In reply, I have the honor to say that some time in April last I received, among unofficial letters upon political questions from citizens at home and abroad, one of this character which was addressed to myself personally, and which bears date the 24th of March last, from James E. Harvey, Esq., who is the minister resident of the United States at Lisbon. On reading the letter and finding it to contain a discussion of the policy of the Administration in regard to the closing of the civil war, I submitted it, with others of the same character, to the President of the United States for his information. He remitted it to me with a suggestion that it might be expedient to publish it. I thereupon handed the original or a copy of it to the publisher or agent of the New York Times. It did not then seem to me nor did it occur to me that it might seem to others that the letter had either any official character or any special reference to Congress. The letter was published without any thought that it reflected upon Congress or even that it alluded to them, and simply for its bearing upon the question of reconciliation and the tribute which I thought it justly paid to the President of the United States in connection with that question.

By the President's direction I inclose the letter to you for the information of the committee.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

R. J. STEVENS, Esq., Secretary to the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Several SENATORS. Let the other letter be read.

Mr. SUMNER. I have here the letter of Mr. Harvey, and I will ask that that be read also.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it be read, so that it may go on the record.

39TH CONG. 1ST SESS.—No. 348.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

LISBON, March 24, 1866.

DEAR GOVERNOR: I thank you for myself and for many others for your recent speech in New York, which has the ring of the true metal, and is a direct and logical consequence of the policy consistently shaped through the last four years. If the Administration cannot be sustained in fighting on "that line" it had better surrender absolutely, for no other plan of campaign can possibly succeed, and if it fails, woe be to those who cause the defeat.

The folly and madness of some of our so-called friends astound and mortify those who are removed from the hot atmosphere of passion and interest. They make willful war upon the man who, of all others, challenges, from exceptional causes, respect, admiration, and sympathy, for his noble conduct, and who has made more sacrifices for the great principles which have triumphed than these self-constituted leaders, backed by their admiring followers, have done all their lives, or probably would do, in presence of such dangers as he incurred for their defense. Tried by the sternest tests to which human endurance could be subjected, he has exhibited a grand and imposing fidelity, which stands out in striking relief to the cheap professions of revilers, who shouted loudly enough for the "cause" whose advocacy involved no personal peril, and whose zeal was not without the promise of reward.

Certainly I have never been of the number of those who admired the President's former "Democracy" in its party sense, but I should feel myself wanting in the heart of a true American could I withhold, or see withheld, from him the justice due to such rare devotion as he has shown, or fail to recognize his pre-eminent services to the Union and his modest but unflinching loyalty, or hold back the grasp of gratitude and affection. When we do not honor such qualities we dishonor ourselves. Since attaining his high responsibilities he has exhibited capacities of statesmanship and traits of personal character which have extorted the admiration of the nations in Europe least disposed to look with favor upon our institutions or the men who shape and illustrate them. Duty, patriotism, and even selfishness, all combined, as it were, to urge the support of the wise and practical policy which the Administration was obliged to accept and pursue in the absence of any devised or proposed by Congress for a state of peace. Differences of detail might be expected in the new order of things, but surely they did not warrant such accusations as were made and such menaces as were more than intimated against the President, or the slightest withdrawal of confidence from him, much less a rupture, which in some quarters seemed to have been designedly provoked. While any collision between the majority in Congress and the President is to be regretted, the recent explosion will operate like electricity in clearing the atmosphere. The common strong sense of the country will vindicate itself again, as it has often done before, by an instruction likely to be remembered by those who would "rule or ruin." The people are weary of agitation, merely for the sake of agitation, and they demand that peace, order, and law shall be reestablished throughout the length and breadth of the Union. Faction can no more arrest the march of those events than the march of the waves, which will not go so far and no further at their bidding, though they may command with the tongue of a thousand Canutes.

Let the Administration go straight forward and without shrinking and all will be well, how! as partisanship may at its heels. Look at the record of your own individual experience since 1861, if instruction and encouragement be needed. Who so persecuted, outraged, and traduced and by many who should hang their heads down in very shame, and who so triumphantly honored and sustained, even to the dangerous point of being praised by the compelled homage of revilers?

If it were possible to destroy the Union and with it all hopes of the future, the men engaged in and exciting the crusade would be exactly the appropriate instruments. All their endeavors, their enthusiasm, and their desires have been directed to that end, if not with intention, at least with a mischievous policy, that if successful could produce no other result. They seem to have taken their lessons of wisdom from the Duke of Alva, whose advice, unreason, and obstinate conduct cost Philip II, one of the fairest parts of his dominions. Minus the form of the Inquisition—of which the modern Alva would preserve all the punishment—there is a striking parallel between the champions of harsh and headstrong zeal three hundred years ago and that which lashes itself into fury now, and merely because it cannot have "its own way."

We are fighting a new battle for the Union, and against foes the more dangerous for being insidious and within the lines of our camp. But I have not a particle of doubt about the result, any more than I had about the issue of the other war, when our proper strength could be collected and judiciously applied.

The crisis demands positive remedies and direct treatment. Quackery will kill in this extremity. Therefore the sooner it is understood that the line must be drawn broadly and clearly the sooner will the Administration be relieved from some of the dangers which incidentally menace it.

Whoever has studied the events of the war must be convinced that the black man cared very little for his own status or was willing to make much effort to change it. No such opportunity was ever offered to an enslaved race to strike for itself, and certainly encouragement enough was given to it to do so in some directions. Every proper and humane man feels that, emancipated as that race now is, it should have every just aid and protection until able to help itself.

But let me tell you, from some little observation on the subject and some knowledge of the people, that human ingenuity could not devise a more effective method for fastening another form of bondage upon them than this ballot, which is proposed as their sovereign panacea. Give them that right and I would pledge my life on the result, if the test could be fairly made, that almost ninety per cent. of the whole black population would vote on the side of their old masters; or, in other words, become the instruments of fastening new chains upon themselves. And if ever the day comes (which I hope never to see for fear of the consequences) when these people may vote without condition, you may expect to see the South compacted by negro suffrage and uniting with the northern so-called "Democracy" to regain possession of the Government and overthrow everything thus far accomplished. And such a result would be quite in keeping with the sagacity and the moderation of those who are ready to sacrifice everything sacred to the one idea of their foolish fanaticism.

I have not been able to see the imminency of a war of races on account of the ballot, as supposed by the President, but I do see in it the much more serious danger now suggested. The old hatred and jealousy between the negro and the ignorant white class (that the negro in his loftiness calls the "poor buckra") would lead to collision, probably, if they were approached by an equalizing process like suffrage, but I cannot think anything serious would come of it. The political aspect of the question, is much graver, and ought not to be ignored. Of course Frederick Douglass and his followers would argue differently, but experience is worth a little more than their delusive theories.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me we have heard enough of that. ["Oh, no."] There is no need to take up the time here in reading this dissertation.

Mr. POMEROY. I thought of objecting to the reading of this letter, but I understood the Secretary, in the first letter which was read, to say that this had "the ring of the true metal," and I wanted to hear it and see it published.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The letter has been published, if anybody wants to see it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to the reading of the letter, it will be determined by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. WADE. I wish to inquire whether that is a private letter, and how it came to be published.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is a private letter, I understand.

Mr. WADE. How came it before us? Can anybody tell?

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. Seward tells us in his letter that it was published at the instance of the President of the United States.

Mr. WADE. I understand it to be a private letter, published without the authority of the writer, and whatever its statements may be, I think we do ourselves no honor in reading it over in public or basing any action whatever upon it. It looks to me as though it had no business here before us, no matter what it may contain, and that we ought to base no action upon a private letter drawn out in that way.

Mr. HOWARD. I suppose the reading is very nearly finished. I have listened with great attention and considerable interest to the statements contained in the letter, especially with a view to find that part of it which contained "the ring of the true metal." Thus far I have not been able to hear that peculiar "ring," and I wish that the letter may, in justice to the author, be read entirely through in order that we may get at the nub of it, if it has any.

Mr. JOHNSON. When the existence of this letter was brought to the attention—

Mr. SUMNER. I hope, before the Senator proceeds, that the reading of the letter will be finished.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought it was finished. I think we have heard enough of it. I move to dispense with the further reading of the letter.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the letter will be proceeded with.

The Secretary continued the reading, as follows:

Wishing you well through all these vexations, I am, as ever, faithfully,

JAMES E. HARVEY.

[Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. I was satisfied that the letter had nearly all been read, and could not imagine what more the writer could have said.

When the fact of the existence of a letter of this description was brought to the attention of the Senate some time ago I expressed great surprise, and stated, as well as I recollect, that I could hardly believe that it was an official letter, and I thought that the Secretary, in directing it to be published, as would seem to be the case, had acted with great imprudence, to say the least of it. Now, the Secretary tells us:

"Some time in April last I received, among unofficial letters upon political questions from citizens at home and abroad, one of this character, which was addressed to myself personally, and which bears date the 24th of March last, from James E. Harvey, Esq."

The letter was intended to be a private communication to the Secretary of State. The writer never contemplated that it should be published. It was written evidently with no such design: but, as the Secretary says, it was precisely like various other letters of the same kind that he had received from persons abroad, persons either in or out of official connection with the Government. The Secretary tells us that he showed this letter to the President, and the President suggested that it might be as well to publish it, and that he published it in consequence of that suggestion.

The Secretary goes on further to say that if anybody is to be blamed it is not the writer. Clearly, the blame is to fall, if at all, on the Secretary and President for sanctioning it; but in publishing the letter the Secretary says he had not the slightest idea that it contained any reflection upon Congress or any member of Congress. He looked upon it as containing a mere expression of opinion upon the political condition of the country, without dreaming that it could be tortured—I do not use his language, but the substance—into an attack upon Congress.

Now, with due deference to the Secretary and to the President, I think they made a great blunder in publishing the letter. It is a letter that never should have been published, looking to the relations in which the Executive stands to Congress, and it is a letter that never should have been published looking to the character of the letter, it being a private one from the writer to the Secretary of State. It was published without consulting the writer, and I have every reason to believe, from my knowledge of the man, that if he had been consulted he would have refused positively to allow it to be given to the public. I agree, therefore, with the honorable member from Ohio [Mr. WADE] that it is not right to base any action as against the writer of this letter on the fact that without his authority, and contrary to what I think propriety demanded, the letter has been given to the public. He has, as far as I know, very faithfully discharged his duties. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations perhaps knows that better than I do; but I have never heard any complaint urged against him in relation to the manner in which his duties have been discharged. The House of Representatives proposed to abolish the mission. That it was found, I suppose, could not be done, and the committee of conference have adopted another measure, and that is to prevent the incumbent of the mission from being paid at all for his services.

Mr. SUMNER. Any further services.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is he is to remain there without pay, or, if he cannot remain there without pay, he is to resign upon compulsion. It seems to me to be unjust. I do not speak it in reference to myself, for I am not in the habit of writing private letters; but I can very well imagine that gentlemen of warm political temper, in and out of public life, write letters which are intended to be confidential letters that should be held as confidential, without dreaming that they are violating any duty which they owe to the Government or to any member of the Government. It seems to me that what has been done by the committee of conference is not called for by the actual condition in which the incumbent is placed.

Mr. WADE. I hope we shall not pursue this subject any further. I certainly do not sympathize with the sentiments of that letter any more than any gentleman upon this floor does; but when I consider the way in which it came before the public, when it was evidently designed as a confidential letter, it seems to me we ought to take no action upon it. Besides, how much worse is the man who wrote that letter than they who approved of its sentiments and sent it to us, and who are now in the pay of the United States, and will be probably for a long time? Sir, the sentiments in that letter certainly deserve no more reprehension from the Senate than the conduct of those who have approved of those sentiments and sent them before the world. If we are to take the pay from one, why not apply the principle to all who concur in these sentiments and who are hostile to the principles we hold, and who have sent the letter here? Are they not as much to blame as he who wrote it? There is no difference between them in that particular; and if the conduct of the minister is so reprehensible that his pay should be stopped because he wrote the letter, then those who received the letter and approved and published it, when it was written as a confidential one, are just as reprehensible as the man who wrote it. I think Congress had better drop the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I regret that this provision is inserted in the report of the committee of conference; and I have no idea that if it could have been avoided the committee on the part of the Senate would have consented to it. The reason of my regret is that I think it is rather undignified for us to notice anything of that sort coming from a minister. But I understand from the chairman of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate that the question was simply to abandon the bill or have some provision of that sort.

Mr. SUMNER. That was so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That being the case, I do not see that there is anything left to us but to do one of two things, either abandon the bill or let this provision remain; and I shall vote to pass the bill, although I should prefer not to have this clause in it. That is the simple question before the Senate, and therefore I shall vote for the acceptance of the report of the committee of conference.

As I said on a former occasion, I think that if we paid any attention to this letter, we could not have avoided coming to the conclusion that it was intended to be a severe reflection upon Congress, or upon a certain portion of Congress. That is as manifest as anything can be.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no doubt of it, as the Senator from Maryland says. How the Secretary of State could have read the letter and not have known that it is a mystery to me. Probably he did not think it worthy of much attention or much notice, and therefore did not give his mind to it. He says he published it at the suggestion of the President.

Although I agree that it is hardly worth while for us as a Congress to notice the letter in this way, I think there is no mistaking its character. It was written evidently because the writer thought that by puffing the President and the Secretary of State and praising their course and abusing those in Congress who did not agree with them, that he would please the Secretary of State, ingratiate himself with that officer and secure his position. I presume that is all there is of it; and he wrote the letter not for publication unquestionably, but simply for the attainment of that purpose. He was willing to do it with that view. Now, whatever I might think of the minister who would do such a thing, I certainly should agree with those Senators who say that it was hardly worth while for Congress to take any notice of it. If the sense of propriety which was due to a coordinate department of the Government did not of itself induce his removal and the appointment of somebody else by the proper authorities, it would have been better for Congress to pass it over in silence, especially as it is evident that the letter was not intended for publication. But it got out; it was seen fit to publish it; the name of the writer was given, and perhaps some notice could hardly be avoided. Though I entertain my own private opinion, which I now make public, [laughter,] in reference to the character of the letter itself, I do not think it worth while to lose an important bill on a provision which the House insist upon inserting here.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Maine has not stated the case too strongly. I do not know that I shall not be justified in speaking freely of what passed in the committee of conference considering the point that has been made. When we came together, the chairman on the part of the House made haste to let us know that unless we accepted the proposition from the House on this subject the committee might as well be dissolved without proceeding any further. We were therefore driven to consider that question at the outset. It occurred to the committee of the Senate that even if they could come into the views of the House at all, the form adopted by the House was not proper. After some conversation that form was amended to read according to the words at the desk, and as thus amended it was agreed to by the committee on the part of the Senate. It was agreed to on their part to save the bill, and in economy of time, feeling that they would not be justified in coming back to the Senate and reporting a disagreement, compelling both Houses to constitute new committees with the same question to be presented by another committee on the part of the House.

You will bear in mind, sir, therefore, that this question was not originally presented by the Senate; it came from the House; and what you have now before you was the compromise reached by your committee after considerable discussion, and, all things considered, it was the best form in which, in the view of your committee, the question could be put.

I do not know that I need say anything further; but I will make one remark in reply to the Senator from Maryland. He dwells particularly on the character of this letter as not intended for publication. He will bear in mind, however, that it was addressed to the Secretary of State; that it was by him communicated to the President; and that at the suggestion of the President it was communicated to the public. It may not have been originally intended by the writer for publication; probably it was, as is commonly called, a private letter; but through the instrumentality of the President and of the Secretary of State it found its way before the public. Congress was thus arraigned by this public servant in a foreign country, and the Representatives of the people in the other House felt themselves justified in taking steps, so far as they could, to remove that functionary from the public service. They felt that the writer of such a letter as that ought not to be in the public service at this time, especially when that letter had found its way into print through the agency of the President and of the Secretary of State. I think, to a certain extent, they were justified in that conclusion. I do not say that if I had had the honor of being a member of the other House I should have taken any steps to originate the proceedings which they adopted; but I must say that I do sympathize with them in thinking that the writer of such a letter, setting forth such sentiments, and thus hostile to those principles which we, the majority of the Congress of the United States, regard as essential to the public welfare, ought not to hold office abroad. I do not wish any such man to speak for our country in a foreign land.

But, sir, this whole discussion seems to me a good deal out of place. The question is on the report of the committee of conference, which involves a great many matters, of which this is only one, and involves the fate of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, it has been remarked that the letter under consideration was published at the request or suggestion of the President of the United States. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether that be so; whether there was any evidence of that before the committee.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly. It appears in the letter of the Secretary of State which has been read at the desk.

Mr. HOWARD. I am inclined to think the House has done exactly right in cutting off for the future all compensation from the present American minister resident at Portugal. The letter, as has been very justly remarked, contains many very severe strictures upon the conduct and policy of Congress, which I think had commenced its session at the date of the letter, and had been in session for some months before the publication of the letter.

I do not understand what right an American minister abroad has to pass such reflections upon the legislative authority of his country, whether they be found in a private letter or in a public dispatch. I can draw no distinction of the kind. An American minister abroad who assumes to censure the conduct of his country at home, or its policy, or to set himself up as a judge and a censor of the public conduct of his country at home, is not, in my opinion, fit to be the representative of that country. It does not belong to him either in his public or private letters to dabble in the politics of his country and to show himself a partisan.

I listened, sir, with a great deal of pain to the sentiments contained in that letter. It is written in the spirit of partisanship, and of hired and paid partisanship, written for the purpose of being used as a partisan document, and the person to whom it was addressed saw fit to use it for that purpose. It has been used, and manifestly for the purpose and for the promotion of the interest in which it was written. I prefer, sir, to teach this gentleman who thus assumes to represent the American Government abroad, that for the future he cannot be paid for spending his time in Portugal in such vile and unworthy employments.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I should regret very much to see this report adopted. I think that Congress, in the adoption of this report, cannot stand before the country upon any sound principle. I have heard these statements made over and over again, that the fate of a bill depends upon concurring in a report of a committee. We have yet four days of this session, and I have seen very many appropriation bills passed within the last two days of a session and become laws. There is no danger such as is suggested. But suppose the Senate does not in sentiment agree with the report, are we therefore to concur in it because there is danger to the bill? Is this objectionable system of legislating through the means of a committee of conference to force upon the country propositions that are not agreeable to the Senate, upon the assurance that the fate of the bill depends upon it?

What have we here as a justification for cutting off from a foreign minister his salary? Simply a proposition that he has written a private letter which has become public without his knowledge or request. Suppose this were a public letter addressed to one of the journals of the country by himself, would it be a justification to us in refusing to pay him his salary? The Senator from Michigan says that it is written in the spirit of partisanship. I am surprised to hear that objection come from him. Is he not a party man? Does he not make it a test of confirmation to office that men shall be party men? Has he agreed that the offices of this country shall be filled by none except those who are not party men? No, sir; the objection of the Senator is not that the writer of the letter is a party man, or that the letter is written in a spirit of partisanship, but his objection is that it is not written in the spirit of his partisanship. He expects the officeholders of the country to agree with him in his political views; it is all right when a man writes in the spirit of his own partisanship, but if he writes in the spirit of the policy of the President, then he is to be condemned and not to be paid in an office!

I was very much surprised that the Senator from Maine should concur in this report. He has set his face, so far, as far as I have observed, against anything that is revolutionary in its tendency, and this certainly is of that character. If we can say that because a man does not agree with us, we cannot turn him out, the Constitution does not allow that, but we will go as far in that direction as we can, and we will compel him to leave his office—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator probably did not attend to what I said. I said distinctly that this proposition was not according to my judgment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I know that, and therefore I expressed myself with great care, for I said I was surprised that the Senator had given his consent to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not give my consent to it. I only say that it is better to have this provision in than to lose the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I know that is what the Senator said, and therefore upon that consideration I understand the Senator to agree to vote for this report. Now, I do not think, in the first place, the bill is in danger. It has never been held that we must agree to the report of the first committee of conference. If the report is not agreeable to us we appoint another committee. It is not, as I understand it, for Senators to meet a committee of the House, and for the chairman of the House committee to say, "If you do not come to the terms of the House there is no use in holding a conference." That is not the spirit in which the two Houses meet, and I do not understand that the Senate is expected to yield to such a spirit.

But, sir, the proposition is that we cannot turn a man out because his political views differ from those of a majority of the Senate; but we will go just as far as we can; we will compel him to abandon the office; we will pay everybody else that holds office according to law; and an appropriation bill, according to the rules of the Senate, is simply to carry out the law. The law is that there shall be a minister at Portugal; the law is that he shall receive a fixed salary; the appropriation bill is simply to carry that out. Now, we say that we will not execute the law; that we will compel a man to resign by refusing to pay him his salary; and upon what reason? Because he has written a private letter, and because that letter has been published.

What is there wrong in that letter? Taking the letter itself, what is there wrong in it? In the first place he compliments, I think in very appropriate language, the President of the United States. It may be that a man holding office at the pleasure of the President ought never to compliment him. It may be that Senators are right in that criticism; but the compliment is right. No Senator here will dare say, I think, that anything that is said in the letter in regard to the course of the President during the rebellion is not strictly sustained by the history of the rebellion. Is it not true that Mr. Johnson did stand out in favor of the cause of the nation? Is it not true that he did stand out under circumstances of great embarrassment and danger and inconvenience and discomfort to himself? Is it not true that he risked more in his devotion to the Union than any Senator upon this floor? That is the argument of the letter.

The next point made by the letter is that the policy of Congress is not right. The question is simply, has he a right to say that? The Senator from Michigan thinks not. Because he holds an office he is not allowed to speak! When did the Senator from Michigan first announce that doctrine? I think for the first time to-day. I never heard that he complained that gentlemen of his own political faith availed themselves of their position and their commanding influence before the country to influence public opinion. Is it true that because a man holds an office, either at home or abroad, he ceases to be a citizen, ceases to be interested in the prosperity of the country, and ceases to have a right to express his views upon important questions.

For awhile it was attempted to be disguised that there was a difference between the President and Congress. I recollect to have heard an able argument from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to prove that there was but very little difference. I did not believe in the argument then; I do not now. There was then, there is now, a marked difference between the views of the majority of Congress and those of the President of the United States. We all know that; we know it as well as we know anything. The President believes, in regard to the southern States, that a certain policy ought to be adopted, and the majority of Congress believes that another policy ought to be adopted. Now, I ask Senators if that difference between the executive department of the Government and the legislative department of the Government is not a proper subject of criticism and remark by any citizen, whether in or out of office. Has a man a right to discuss what Congress does or not? You say, a man shall not have his salary because he criticises what Congress is doing. Is that upon the principle that you are afraid to have it discussed? No; Senators will not admit that. Why is it, then, that a man has not a right to discuss the position of Congress upon a great question of the country? Congress says these States shall not now come back; the President says that they ought to come back in all their relations to the Federal Government at once—the gravest question, perhaps, that ever was presented. Now, is this minister abroad to be blamed because he participates in the discussion of a grave question, and because he differs with Congress on that question, and because he illustrates his views by historical references, by force of argument, by earnest appeal? That is what this writer has done; and if we agree to this report of the committee of conference, it is saying in other words that no man shall receive his salary in an office if he differs with Congress and he chooses to criticise Congress. In other words, Congress takes one step to close the mouth of every man who differs with the majority of Congress, and will not allow its course and policy to be criticised. I think we cannot quite afford to take that step. I think the majority cannot very well afford it. On that, however, they will judge for themselves. I should regret to see this report agreed to. The bill need not be lost. I think a majority of this body cannot agree to this report. It is not right, it is not politic, it is not just. Let us see what will become the fate of this bill by another committee. We have plenty of time for that yet.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, of course no just man would object to any fair and honest and impartial criticism that might be either uttered or written by any American citizen at home or abroad respecting the policy or the legislation of Congress. As to that description of criticism I have nothing to say, I have no fault to find. But the letter which is now upon your table, sir, contains very much that is not worthy of the name of criticism. It contains a series of unfair reflections upon Congress, expressions which are disrespectful to Congress, and some of them are almost insulting to Congress. It speaks of a majority in Congress in terms which would hardly be tolerated between gentlemen. Does the Senator from Indiana regard such expressions as being just and manly criticisms upon the action of Congress? Certainly he is too good a judge of the force and effect of language to suppose for a moment that they are worthy of the name of just criticism. The letter contains a series of mere diatribes against Congress, mixed up with a profusion of panegyrics upon the President of the United States and what is called his "policy," speaking in terms of disparagement and contempt of the majority of Congress, and going so far—if I understood the letter properly—as almost to advise revolutionary measures on the part of the Executive.

Sir, it is in vain to pretend that this letter contains nothing but just and fair criticism upon Congress. I would by no means restrain the freedom of speech or the freedom of discussion in a foreign minister in regard to the policy of his country; but every gentleman must see that the very position held by an American minister abroad is one which ought to elevate him high above the storms and clouds of partisan contest at home. It is not for him to intermingle in those contests; and, as I said before, I can entertain no doubt that the purpose of this minister was, in writing the letter, that it should be laid before the American people and then taken in the newspapers home to Europe, where it originated, in order to show the world how important a position was held by the writer and how much weight ought to be given to his opinions. It is written in the very spirit of partisanship and nothing else; and I think that when an American minister so far forgets the dignity which belongs to his station and the impartiality which he ought to observe in all his correspondence in regard to party contests in his country, at home he is not deserving of further patronage from the Government which he thus maligns and abuses. It is upon that ground of unfairness in these strictures, of partiality, and of partisanship, that I shall refuse to vote him any further salary from this time forth, and that I shall concur in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the Senator takes his seat I wish to ask him one question. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan if it be right to withhold from this subordinate office-holder his salary because in a private letter he has expressed his views upon the question of difference between Congress and the President, because he wrote that private letter; is the Senator prepared to say that the President shall not have his salary because he holds these views in opposition to Congress and because he contributed to the publication of this letter? And if the Senator is willing to go that far, is he willing to go still further in the course of revolution and to deny to every office-holder his salary where he differs from the majority in Congress?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, as I remarked before, there is a great distinction between the official position held by an American minister abroad and any officer at home. An American minister is not expected to take part in the political partisan squabbles of his country at home. If there be difficulty in the family, if there be disputes between members of the same household, it is the duty of each and every one of them to conceal, so far as practicable, the fact that such dissensions exist. It is not necessary for a foreign minister, nor is it proper in a foreign minister, to be flirting into the faces of foreign Governments the fact that his country is divided by partisan dissensions; he ought to throw the veil of charity and concealment over such facts so far as is practicable to him. Decency and a proper sense of decorum, it seems to me, would require this at the hands of a foreign minister.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator if there is any evidence that Mr. Harvey has published any views that are distasteful to him abroad. This letter was written to the Secretary of State at home; it is a private letter; and now I ask whether the Senator is willing to withhold from the President and from the Secretary of State their salaries because they have consented to the publication of these views and because they concur in them, because they differ from the majority in Congress, and if so whether that is not revolution.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, that question implies a very different state of facts from that which exists with regard to Mr. Harvey. Mr. Harvey is a foreign minister, residing abroad, and representing his country as a nation abroad. It is because he is in that high position, one in which he ought to observe impartiality in his communications as to the state of parties in his own country, that I now find fault with him. I would not refuse to the President of the United States his salary simply because he does not concur with me in political opinion, nor would I refuse salary to any other officer at home for the same reason; but that is not the question. The question is whether a foreign minister who has so far forgotten the dignity and impartiality which pertain to his station as to be disrespectful to the Government of his country shall be for the future paid and supported by that Government. Are we willing to submit to disrespect and almost insult and to pay the offender out of the public Treasury? That is the question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator one further question. Last Congress the Administration was spoken of as "the Government." When has it come to be the fact that Congress is now the Government? The Senator now speaks of a criticism upon Congress as an attack upon "the Government." Last Congress and the Congress before if any man spoke of the President, it was said to be an attack upon "the Government." When has he adopted this change of views in regard to where "the Government" is?

Mr. HOWARD. I recollect very well that in the attacks of the honorable Senator from Indiana upon the Republican party, or rather the majority of Congress, he was in the habit of treating the executive government as being the Government of the United States.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. But so far as I am concerned, I beg to say that I never spoke of the Government of the United States or the Government as being anything else but the Congress of the United States, the executive and all its branches, associated with the judicial department of the Government of the United States. It is these several departments which I regard as the Government of the United States, and to impute to me the fault, if it be a fault, of speaking of the executive branch of the Government of the United States as the Government is an imputation which the Senator must know very well is entirely unfounded. I never spoke of it in that way, nor have I been in the habit of listening to my political friends here and hearing them speak of it in the same way. I know that it has been imputed to us that we then regarded the Executive as being the Government, but that was a mere artifice of political adversaries, used for the purpose of stigmatizing the majority in Congress as having yielded up all power to the President. That was all it was—a mere party fling and nothing else. No sensible man, certainly on this side of the Chamber, has ever spoken and treated of the executive department of the Government of the United States as the Government. In short, the Senator will allow me to say that this charge which he thus brings against us, and which he has so often reiterated here, is entirely unfounded, utterly unfounded. I will not say it is a creature of his own brain, for I know very well that the same imputation has been frequently hurled against us by the adversary all over the country. It is useless for him and me to discuss such a question as this, as we both know quite well what the Government of the United States means and implies.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I am exceedingly sorry that such a question as this should ever be debated in the Senate of the United States. Suppose we admit everything said by the honorable Senator from Michigan, and charged against this public servant, does that justify us in breaking our contract with him?

Mr. HOWARD. It is no contract.

Mr. COWAN. It is no contract! When we employ a servant to go abroad and represent us abroad, and we stipulate by the law that we will pay him a fixed annual sum for his services, there is no contract in that, and that can be violated with impunity, and himself and his wife and his children left to starve in a foreign land!

Mr. HOWARD. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania regard an office, from which the incumbent is removable at pleasure, as a contract?

Mr. COWAN. Unquestionably; and a higher form of contract on the part of the Government than that which binds individual men.

Mr. HOWE. If, then, the President removes a man from office, does he violate a contract?

Mr. COWAN. No, sir, he does not violate a contract. The removal from office is one of the contingencies provided for by law; but is it provided for by law that if an American minister abroad chooses to give his opinion upon public affairs here he shall not be paid his salary? If that is the law, then I admit we have a perfect right to treat Mr. Harvey's letter in the way some gentlemen here would like to have it treated; but that is not the law.

Mr. HOWE. Then, if I understand the Senator, if Congress takes away the pay of the minister to Portugal for the next year, that is a violation of contract, but if the President takes Mr. Harvey away from the pay, that does not violate the contract.

Mr. COWAN. Exactly; and I give the honorable Senator from Wisconsin credit for putting it in the most adroit, bamboozling, sophistical way that anybody could put it; and yet it does not amount to a bubble. The stupidest man in the galleries would detect it upon the instant. It is simply a play upon words. Why, sir, there is not the slightest resemblance between depriving a man of his pay and depriving him of his office; and certainly if Senators had given free play to their brains they would have seen the reason, and I should not be obliged to tell it a second time. This man holds his office by the law. He is entitled to his salary by the law. One of the contingencies upon which he holds his office is that he may be removed by the President, and he takes it subject to that contingency. He is notified of that at the time that he takes it; and to exercise that power upon him is no violation whatever of the contract. But to take away his pay, to strike at the sustenance of his wife and children, to leave him in a foreign land, perhaps to starve—who ever heard of such a thing? Is that your remedy if your minister misbehaves? Is there no other way by which you can get rid of him? Gentlemen say, what are we to do about it? This dominant party in Congress has got so thin-skinned that a boy can hardly point at it in the street but that he must be carried into the public councils here and a great parade made about it. What is the country coming to? Is the majority in Congress to be sacred? I always thought that a majority in Congress was great and magnanimous, high-toned, looking aloft rather than seeking about among the gutters to see who threw insults. They leave all the magnanimity to be exercised by the minority. But now if you are to remedy this by taking away a man's pay and a man's salary, you might just as well take away the pay and salary of the minority here. Where is the difference? If we do not speak to please you, if we do not criticise you in the most gentle phrase, and after the most approved method, forsooth, you will take away our pay! You had a great deal better do that than this. We might get home; but if you were to leave us in Portugal or in a foreign land we might not be able to get back.

Where is the law that an American minister abroad is restrained in his free thought and free speech as a free citizen of this country? Where is the rule? Where is the custom and the usage? Nobody ever heard of such a thing. An American minister abroad has as much right to criticise the action of his Government as anybody else has, and he ought never to yield that right. Certainly gentlemen here who proclaim themselves the advocates of the largest liberty and the largest free speech, and enjoying the largest amount of abuse that I have ever known any set of men to indulge in, ought of course to allow an American minister abroad to write a private letter to a friend, even if that friend is indiscreet enough to publish it.

If this man is an improper minister, if he fails to represent the dignity of the nation abroad, if he is incompetent, there is a remedy. The remedy is in the hands of the chosen officer of the Republic, your choice and my choice, and made so by the law and the Constitution. If we are not patriots, if we are not lovers of our country, we ought to be gentlemen enough at least to stand upon our contract. You clothed the President at the other end of the avenue with the right to appoint and remove these ministers abroad. You have agreed to it. You differ with a large number of your fellow-citizens as to the way in which he exercises this power. Who is to decide? The law decides; the law provides for this difference of opinion; and when you happen to differ from the President in such a case you must submit, just as he must submit when you differ in exercising your proper functions here as against his opinion.

But if the President will not remove this officer you have another thing that you can do. You can abolish the mission. You can fight the man fairly. If you do not like him you can at least treat him within your sphere and within the limits of your jurisdiction over his case, and do it fairly. If Mr. Harvey has offended apply the legal remedy; but do not let us violate our own national honor; do not let us be false to the national faith, and do not let us repudiate our contracts. Let us pay him what we owe him, just as a common man is bound to pay his laborer; and because we are a great Government, and because we represent the sovereignty of the nation, we should be proud that no such blot or stain has ever been cast upon it, as I say this debate, even mooted the question here in this body, will inevitably cast upon it.

Where is there a precedent for this in the history of the civilized world? I ask, when was it mooted before that a Government could violate its pledged faith to one of its public servants and refuse to pay him his salary just because he did not happen to agree with one of the parties of the country? I say nothing about the character of this letter. Whether it is of an intemperate or temperate character does not make any difference. In the first place, I agree with the honorable Senator from Ohio, who said that this was a private letter, not intended for publication by the writer, or not known that it was so intended, put into circulation by an imprudent friend, if you please. Is he to suffer for that? Are you to make your ministers abroad slaves? Are they to sit down at their desks, even in their private correspondence, with a seal, not upon their lips exactly, but upon the very action of their brains, to think as you think? I hope, sir, that the Senate will not come to any such conclusion. I do trust they will not, for their own sake, apart from all else. Nothing, I think, could be so mischievous; nothing could give our Government such a character abroad as the news that our minister at Portugal was refused his salary because he criticised the action, not of Congress, not of the Government, but of a party in Congress. What would Europe say? What would be the jeers and scoffs and scorn of the monarchists for our Government if you give it to them to say all over Europe. "What has republicanism come to? Where has it come to? Is not the tyranny," they would say, "of a faction a thousand times worse than the tyranny of a despot?" Is there a despot in Europe who would dare to refuse pay to one of his public servants because that servant had written a letter of this kind? Nobody would think of it.

Gentlemen who are so exceedingly tender and thin-skinned about what is said in regard to them will listen patiently, I trust, while I read a telegram that is paraded this morning publicly in our newspapers, indited I am told by a high public functionary of this land; one in great favor with the dominant party; one who stands extremely high in the esteem of gentlemen who complain of this letter; one who fixes his aim not upon a party, but upon an individual, and that the individual whom above all others the American people have delighted to honor—not that the American people are bound to believe everything that he believes; not that they are bound to follow his opinions; but he represents, and especially does he represent to people abroad, the majesty of this great Republic. May I ask, what joy, what chuckling, and bubbling up of profound pleasure took place among these same gentlemen who are so thin-skinned when they read this morning this telegram:

NASHVILLE, July 19, 1866.

Hon. J. W. FORNEY,

Secretary United States Senate, Washington.

We have fought the battle and won it. We have ratified the constitutional amendment in the House—43 votes for it, 11 against it, two of Andrew Johnson's tools not voting. Give my respects to the dead dog of the White House.

W. G. BROWNLOW.

And the writer of this elegant epistle is, or I believe professes to be, a man of God; a man whose mission it was here on earth to preach peace and good-will to all men; a man who was to employ himself in stilling and calming the waves of passion as they aroused the people; a man, in other words, who professes himself a follower of a divine Master who proclaimed that love was the great clement which entered and should enter into the composition of true religion upon earth—this man writes this telegram to the Secretary of the Senate, the highest legislative and judicial tribunal of the land! He insults the majesty of the nation here in her very chosen forum. He insults us; he insults everybody by supposing that we would delight in that low, vile, filthy stuff which even a fishwoman would discard. I venture to say there is not one on the wharves at Alexandria that would, unless provoked, be foul her mouth with such language as that.

Now, compare that with the temperate—I say temperate here in this connection—the temperate criticism of Mr. Harvey upon the course of the majority in Congress. I agree, if that was pointed at a single man, there would be more in it; but that criticism, when applied to a party, is as common as the daylight. But this is unique; this is rare. This is the first time in the history of the Senate, unquestionably, that such a dropping as this has fallen from so foul a bird into this Chamber; and it is the first time, I think, in the history of this Chamber when members of this body would sit patiently by and not vindicate themselves from the charge of being accessories to such vituperation. And this is published with joyful acclaim by an officer of this body, published in the very sanctuary of American decency, because if it is not to be found here, where shall we find it? If we are not to be the exemplars of the nation, at least so far as the use of calumny, vituperation, and Billingsgate is concerned, what are we here for, and what must we expect from the nation that is to take its cue from us?

Gentlemen are afraid that our character will suffer abroad from Mr. Harvey's criticism. What will they think when I tell them that a branch of Congress passed an appropriation to circulate this paper, and to circulate it expressly abroad, as a specimen of American journalism, as a specimen of the respect entertained by the coordinate branches of this Government for one another. I ask, what will monarchical Europe say to that dispatch? What will the aristocracy say to it? I hope they will not read it. I trust, for the sake of our character for common decency, that they will not read it. But, sir, I say to the Democrat of Europe, the man in favor of free institutions, the man in favor of a republican form of government, this will be the bitterest thing possible for him to read.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to say one word?

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. Is not that last clause of Brownlow's telegram intended as a sort of echo to the 22d of February speech, in which the author of that speech spoke of Colonel Forney, to whom that telegram was addressed, as being a dead duck? Does he not understand it to be an echo of that?

Mr. COWAN. I suspect it is.

Mr. HOWARD. I suppose so.

Mr. COWAN. And I should like to know, of all the things in the world, what it was that the opponents of the President picked up, and with such gusto discussed and distributed all over the country, as the fact that he indulged in that allusion in the heat of a stump speech at a serenade, with regard to the Secretary of the Senate. I want to know if there was any one thing in the whole course of the President's life—I say in the whole course of it—that was so carried about in the mouths of his opponents and chewed like a sweet morsel under their tongue everywhere in order to make capital against him. Is not that true? Did not thousands and thousands of his opponents say that if he had not said that his speech was a very good one? But this is not a speech; this is not in the heat of extemporaneous harangue; this is made coolly and deliberately, and sent off a thousand miles here. If the other was wrong, this is atrocious. If the other was the sound and this is the echo, the echo has improved in all that was awful and horrible a thousand times over.

Mr. President, I am no apologist for vituperation of any sort. I never indulge in it. I know no kind of provocation which would induce me so far to forget myself as to write, print, or publish, or allow to be written, printed, or published, anything of mine which descended so low into the depths of human baseness as this. Why is it done? For what purpose? At a time when revolution is predicted and convulsions anticipated by both parties, at a time when the very foundations of society are breaking up, at a time when the worst is expected by men from their political antagonists, is not this the fuel upon which that flame is to be fed? Are not these firebrands which we send out into the standing corn, to create a conflagration which may sweep over the whole country? Is not this another, this striking out of this appropriation, this violation of our pledge to a public servant, emanating from the same source and from the same temper of heart which would seek to do to an antagonist, right or wrong, fair or foul, anything you could do?

Mr. President, I hope that the Senate at least, whatever it may do, will stand upon its faith and preserve the national honor. If you do not pay your minister to Portugal, you cannot satisfy a public creditor that you will pay your debt or your bonds.

Mr. WILSON. I do not see any prospect of getting a vote on this report; and we had a special assignment for one o'clock to-day, the bill for the equalization of bounties, which I desire to take up.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The unfinished business of yesterday takes precedence of that.

Mr. WILSON. It was understood that that was to be disposed of yesterday.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we shall have a vote upon the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to enter my dissent to one doctrine of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania; and that is, that this is a contract that we cannot violate. The Senate has no power over the appointments to office except to confirm or reject them; the appointing power is with the President. But it is very right and very proper that, in a case that justifies it, Congress should exercise the power that it has, and that is, when a public officer is obnoxious, and Congress is satisfied that retaining him in his place is injurious to the public interest or the public honor, it should exercise the power it has and refuse to approprate for the payment of his salary, whatever it may be. That is a power that Congress possesses, and in a proper case it is perfectly right for it to exercise it. It is a check that it has, that the Constitution intended it should have, and it is no violation of contract, because the office terminates when any branch that has power over it sees fit to determine it.

In saying this, I do not wish to be understood as saying that this is a proper case for the exercise of that power. It may or it may not be. I have expressed my opinion already that I would not have taken this notice of this gentleman. I think it is undignified and not creditable in point of fact that it should be so; and I regret that it should have been introduced into the appropriation bill. I think it would have been better to have passed it by with the notice that was taken of it before. That is my opinion about it; but still I remain of the opinion that I expressed, that it is not worth while to lose the appropriation bill upon it, if such is the temper of the House.

I wish also to make one remark, that I do not suppose will do any good, upon this idea that has grown up that either House has a right to lose a bill in the great number of appropriation bills that are passed. By the constitution of these bodies, it takes the two branches to pass any appropriation or to pass any law, or any clause of a law; and I do not think that either House has a right to demand of the other that it shall accede to one particular proposition out of a hundred or that all shall be lost. No one branch has a right to say to the other, "We insist that we will pass this particular clause, whatever it is, and if it is not passed, all shall go by the board." That is just committing the legislation of Congress to one branch. That becomes a law which both Houses agree to and the President approves. But if it so happens that a particular clause cannot be agreed to in both branches, my judgment always has been that it ought to be abandoned by the branch which proposes it, because it takes both branches to make a law. But, nevertheless, a different practice has grown up, and one branch or the other—I do not say one any more than the other—is sometimes, for the sake of saving a bill, compelled to yield its opinions. I do not think that is correct in point of fact; but still, it so happens that it is so. I hope it will be corrected at some time or other.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I understand that this difficulty has originated upon an item of ordinary appropriation for the salary of one of our foreign ministers. I agree with the Senator from Maine that, where a proper occasion arises, it is not only right, but it may be the duty of Congress to make no appropriations to pay salaries. I agree with the Senator from Michigan in one of his positions, that if this minister had entered into a partisan communication, in the presence of the court or authorities of the country to which he was accredited, by which he took the side of the President or the side of Congress in our domestic political troubles, he would be an unfit representative of our country at that court; but I do not understand that this minister has been guilty of any such offense. If the honorable Senator from Michigan, or any other gentleman, can show that these sentiments, which, according to my judgment, are just in truth and in principle in relation to domestic parties here at home, were expressed publicly and openly by our minister at Portugal to the Government or the authorities or the public there. I would say that he was unfit to represent the United States of America at that country.

But I understand the case to be entirely different. I understand that this was a private communication from the minister at Portugal to the Secretary of State; and I have no doubt that if the secret annals of such correspondence, from the beginning of the Government to the present time, could be revealed to the public, there would be ten thousand instances of similar communications.

Now, sir, suppose this letter, instead of taking the side of the President and adopting the line of reasoning and remark that it did, had taken the side of Congress, is anybody so simple-minded and credulous as to think that it would, if it had been revealed to the House, been made the occasion and the cause of withholding his salary from that minister, if he had advocated the side of Congress in precisely similar terms to those in which he has advocated the side of the President?

A partisan minister abroad writes to a friend of the President, of whom he is a partisan, a private letter, which is distasteful to the opposite party. That is the whole of it; and from every inference that we can make in relation to this letter, judging of its contents, it was never intended to be made public. It has been made public without any agency on the part of the writer; and both Houses of Congress seriously make it the subject of so far impeaching the minister abroad as to withhold from him the payment of all salary. If the secrets of different Administrations and their friends and partisans abroad, in relation to their correspondence, could have been obtained, there would be found innumerable instances, I have no doubt, for withholding appropriations upon precisely the same grounds that are now set up as the cause for withholding the salary from this minister.

Now, sir, I will advert to another fact. I am myself a friend to the freedom of speech, and I am willing to tolerate a considerable degree of licentiousness to maintain the freedom of speech. I have witnessed no effort upon the part of the majority in the Senate to control or to correct the licentiousness of speech or debate where it has been directed against the President. We have an officer of the Senate denominated its Secretary. He receives a large salary, and he performs no duties, so far as I have the means of observing his avocations. He publishes a paper in this city and one in the city of Philadelphia, dailies, and in those papers within the last few weeks the most ferocious and indecent diatribes have been published against the President. Where, then, was the zeal of the honorable Senator from Michigan and his friends? If they wanted the employes of the Government, those who are paid by it large salaries, to observe a decent decorum toward the departments of the Government and especially toward the President, was not that a fit occasion and opportunity to rebuke and to correct the licentiousness of the Secretary of the Senate? I have not observed that any such attempt was made.

It seems to me, sir, that the two Houses of Congress are giving too much importance to this matter. As to the last suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Maine, that an important bill should not be jeopardized by an improper position or an improper hostility of one of the Houses of Congress to that bill, I will make simply this remark: the colloquy between the committees of conference when they met upon the subject of this bill has been in part detailed to the Senate, and it reveals to my mind what was not merely a menace, but a very improper and gross menace on the part of the committee of the House to the committee of the Senate: "We have withdrawn from this appropriation bill one of the ordinary and usual items, the salary for the support of a minister abroad to the court of Portugal: you are to accept the eradication of that appropriation from this bill, and unless you do so it is idle and useless to hold any conference on the subject." Why, sir, could anything be more dictatorial, more improper? I do not think that the Senate ought to yield to any such threat. I do not think that the committee on the part of the House should ever have made it, or that they should have ever assumed that position, even if they expressed it in the most proper and qualified terms. I think that that position was altogether unauthorized, and the occasion for erasing that item of appropriation from the bill was altogether insufficient.

I was struck by the few, honorable, manly words of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] on this subject at the opening of the debate. He said truly that this was a private letter; that it was not intended for publication; and not being intended for publication, without regard to the sentiments expressed in the letter, he was opposed to the writer of it, under such a state of fact, from being held to any responsibility; and I think such is the justice and the propriety of the matter.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, this debate is getting a little interesting. For the first half day I did not care much about it; but if it lasts a day or two longer I think I shall be profoundly interested in it. The Senator from Pennsylvania has contrived to lend a charm to it that I did not suppose it was capable of. I supposed the question presented to the Senate on the report of this conference committee was simply whether we should concur in that report or not; but I understand from the Senator from Pennsylvania that it involves us in a breach of faith to begin with, and secondly, that it involves us in revolution. These are two pretty strong objections; and for fear that neither of them would hold good, the Senator, I believe, sets up a counter-claim, and wants to set off against the indignity contained in the letter of our minister at Portugal what he considers the indignity offered to the President of the United States in a dispatch sent from a Governor of Tennessee.

Mr. President, there is no violation of the public faith, there is no breach of a contract involved in our withholding the salary of the minister to Portugal or of any other officer holding office under the Government of the United States. Every such man holding office, holds it, not upon the contract that he shall have it for any given time, nor upon the contract that he shall have any given amount of pay; but he holds it and all men know he holds it simply until he is removed from it, and for such pay as the law may from time to time provide and appropriate. The President has the power to terminate his right to a dollar's salary any day by removing him. The Congress has the power to terminate his right to any given amount of salary by decreasing it or increasing it any day, and has the power to terminate his right to get any salary by withholding the appropriation. These are the conditions under which every man holds office. There is no violation of contract when the President removes him. There is no violation of contract when Congress increases or diminishes the pay; and none when they withhold the appropriation. This power was reserved to Congress for the express purpose of securing to the public service, to the service of the people, such conduct as should be appreciated and approved by them. It is for that reason that while your President can appoint officers, he cannot pay any of them a dollar. It is for that reason that every dollar that goes to any one of your officers must be appropriated by Congress; and that these appropriations may come most directly from the representatives of the people, you cannot originate a bill to appropriate a dollar to anybody, either in the White House or in the Senate, but only in that branch of the Legislature which stands nearest to the people.

Sir, there is no violation of contract here. Is there anything revolutionary? The Senator from Pennsylvania stands here in his seat and cautions us against an act of this kind because the public mind is feverish and all men are predicting revolution and violence and disturbance, and that it is our business to avoid everything that will lead to these results. Has the Senator from Pennsylvania taken the course best calculated to avoid these results? Who predicts revolution and insurrection? Who threatens it? Neither those predictions nor these threats have ever come from me or from those with whom I act.

But, sir, is it true that revolution hangs upon the question whether we pass an appropriation to pay Mr. Harvey or not? Has it come to this, that the Congress of the United States cannot withhold a year's salary to Mr. Harvey without subjecting the country to the dangers of rebellion and insurrection again? Six years ago, I know, we were industriously taught that we could do scarcely anything without endangering rebellion; we could not vote for one law or another, or for one man or another scarcely without subjecting ourselves to the danger of a rebellion. I thought we had got over that. I thought the time had come when the people could vote for such representatives as they pleased, and that their representatives could vote for such laws as they pleased, subject only to the power of the judicial tribunals to set aside their laws when they violated the Constitution, and subject to the right of the sovereign people to set aside their representatives when they disapproved them. If that time has not come, let us pray for it a little longer. It will come by and by.

Mr. President, I am going to vote for this report. I am going to take the responsibility of approving it. I do not vote for it because the House of Representatives has forced us to take it. I do not vote for it in order to save the appropriation bill. I vote for it because I think it is a proper thing to do. One of the public servants, holding a public mission, wrote a letter in which he deliberately argues that the majority in the Congress of the United States are engaged in the work of revolution. I repudiate the idea. I do not think it is just. But, says the Senator from Pennsylvania, where is the law that prevents him from saying this? There is no such law. Mr. Harvey has an undoubted right to say it. So have you; so has any man a perfect right to say it, if he thinks it; and if he does not think it, he has a right to say it if he is willing to lie. That is all the consequence that attaches to it. But Mr. Harvey's right to say these things of the Congress of the United States is no more clearly sanctioned by the laws of the land than is our right to pay or not to pay Mr. Harvey. If Mr. Harvey would rather say these things than have his salary, let Mr. Harvey say them, in God's name; who objects? But then I ask that the Congress shall have the right which the Constitution gives it to vote this appropriation or not. I think our right is just as clear as that of Mr. Harvey. Let Mr. Harvey talk, if it does him good; let us pay if we approve his talk, and not without. I do not like that kind of talk. If I had the power of removal in my hands, I think I should remove him. It is not in my hands; and therefore I will simply withhold his pay. "But he may starve." Starve! Why? "He cannot support himself in Portugal; he is away from home." Let him come home. Nobody guaranteed that he should stay there for all time. All we do is to stop his salary. That would have been done if he was removed from office.

But it is said that he only uttered these sentiments in a private letter. I am not finding any special fault with him for uttering the sentiments. It is because he has them that I object to him. Believing such things, holding such opinions of the Congress of his country, I do not think he is a fit man to represent us abroad, or at home, or anywhere. But as to the fact of its being a private letter, where is the evidence of it? It is nowhere stamped with the character of a private letter. He enjoins upon him to whom it was written no secrecy, no privacy. It is a letter addressed to the Secretary of State, sent to him unconditionally, without any sort of restriction as to how the Secretary should use it. Then it became the Secretary's letter and not Mr. Harvey's. He had parted with those sentiments and placed them in the possession of the Secretary of State, and they were just as much the property of the Secretary of State as anything that he rides or drives or owns or eats with. The Secretary of State saw fit to make it public, to publish it. I think the Secretary of State knew better whether that was a private letter or not than we do; and I do not think these censures are just upon the Secretary and upon the President, wherein they are accused of violating the secret character of a confidential correspondence. There is nothing of that about this letter. The letter was put in the possession of the Secretary of State, containing the sentiments of our minister at Portugal, and he, by the direction of the President, published it. That is all there is of it. That is all the evidence of a confidential character there is to this letter. But, as I said before, I do not condemn him for having the letter published; I do not object to him for publishing the letter; all the objection I have in the world to Mr. Harvey is, that he holds the sentiments which are contained in the letter. True, if the letter had not been written, or, if written, had not been published, I might never have known that he held those sentiments; but it is the holding of them that makes him to me objectionable. It is because he holds them that I think he is not fit to represent us. It is because I think he is not representing us that I shall vote for this provision which withholds from him his pay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on concurring in the report of the committee of conference?

The question being put, the Presiding Officer decided that the report was concurred in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope we shall now proceed with the unfinished business.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I rise to call for the yeas and nays on concurring in that report.

Several SENATORS. It is too late.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that it is too late.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Of course, if the Chair declines to withdraw his decision, I cannot make the call.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 772) to authorize the issue of certain bonds in denominations greater than $1,000;

A bill (H. R. No. 776) in relation to the unlawful tapping of Government water-pipes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 88) declaring Tennessee again entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 191) relating to the building occupied for a national fair in aid of the orphans of the soldiers and sailors of the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business of yesterday, being the civil appropriation bill, is now before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. We had a special assignment for to-day at one o'clock, which was the bill to equalize the bounties of our soldiers. It has been assigned for three or four different days and been pushed aside by the appropriation bills. I supposed that this miscellaneous appropriation bill would be acted upon yesterday, but a great deal of the day was consumed by the bill which was under the care of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] I now move to postpone the pending and all prior orders, and that the Senate take up House bill No. 602, the bill for the equalization of bounties.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of course I cannot consent to that. This is an appropriation bill; we are probably on the eve of the adjournment; and we must dispose of this bill. After we have acted on it, it has to go back to the House again. It is not customary at this period of the session for the appropriation bills, especially when under debate and the unfinished business, to give place to other bills that are not of such pressing importance. I hope the motion will not be agreed to.

Mr. LANE. The bill named by the Senator from Massachusetts to equalize the bounties of our soldiers has been fixed as the special order some three times within the last ten days, and on three several days it has been displaced. I think it is important to act upon that bill and to equalize the bounties, or else let the country know that we do not intend to act upon it. These appropriation bills will go through as a matter of course. They are never, or but very rarely, defeated, and there is no doubt that they will go through; but I desire, for one, to take up the bounty bill and let the country know and the soldiers know whether we are inclined to equalize their bounties or whether we shall do nothing on the subject at this session. It has been displaced three times by the courtesy of the chairman of the Military Committee to give place to other matters not, in my opinion, so urgent and so important as this. Without any disposition to delay or defeat the passage of the appropriation bill, I shall now vote to take up the bounty bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is that the unfinished business, which is the civil appropriation bill, and all prior orders, be postponed, and that House bill No. 602, for the equalization of bounties be taken up.

Mr. LANE. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I am willing to agree to one thing: if we shall be allowed to take up this bill to-morrow, and nothing else shall be allowed to interfere with it, I will not press the motion now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You can take it up then unless there should be some appropriation bill in the way. I do not know that there will be any.

Mr. LANE. I renew the call for the yeas and nays on the motion. I want to put myself right on the record, at least.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. I think no matter how important this bill may be, it is an unusual proceeding to undertake to force an appropriation bill from the Finance Committee, which is partly considered and which is the unfinished business, out of that order that another bill may be taken up. It is, in my opinion, a question that ought not to be raised in the Senate. The priority of business, since I have been in the Senate, has been conceded to the Finance Committee, and I think that rule and order by consent ought to remain. It is disagreeable to vote as between the chairman of the respective committees who raise this question of priority, and as between the bills presented; and I should like to appeal to the honorable Senators who are pressing this matter to withdraw the call for a vote upon this question. Let us go on with the appropriation bill and dispose of that, and then we will vote with them to take up their bill and get a vote upon it. I will, for one.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot agree to that, because there is the tariff bill that must be passed. I presume it will not give rise to any debate; it will not take half an hour; but I must insist on passing it and sending it back to the other House before other business is proceeded with.

Mr. CONNESS. I was not making an agreement, of course, for the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee. I was only adding a word of mine to the end that we should have no contest of this character as to the order of business.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, this bill for the equalization of bounties was assigned for to-day. I understand that according to the order of business in Congress the appropriation bills are usually the last bills that are passed. We know very well that when the appropriation bills are passed the effect usually is to kill other bills not acted upon, however important they may be. The appropriation bills are usually the last things in the order of legislation. Now, sir, this is too important a measure; there is too much expectation in the country; there is too much justice due to our soldiers to pass it over at the present time. Although I have so much deference for the opinion of the Senator from Maine and know the importance of his bills, yet, as it is usual, I believe, that this particular appropriation bill is the last in the order of bills that are passed, I sincerely hope that the bill to which the country is looking, which is of so much interest, the bill to equalize the bounties of our soldiers, will not be passed over, but that we shall proceed to act upon it at this time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us have the question. If the Senate say that the appropriation bills shall give way for this bounty bill, very well.

Mr. WILSON. I will agree to withdraw the motion on this understanding: the appropriation bill now before us was taken up yesterday and is the unfinished business. When that shall be disposed of I shall renew my motion to take up this bill, and I shall then insist upon taking it up as the next business in order. If the Senator disposes of his appropriation bill to-day, we can take this up afterward as the next bill; but I give notice that I will antagonize it to the tariff bill or any other bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I give notice to gentlemen that I must call up that little tariff bill, which will take no time, I presume.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion cannot be withdrawn unless by unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered.

Mr. LANE. If I am permitted to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, I will do so, on the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and at the request of others, but it is with the fear that this bounty bill will not pass or we shall not get a vote upon it at this session. This is the end of it unless its friends urge its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion is withdrawn.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 737) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I send an amendment to the Chair to be inserted at the bottom of page 2, after line thirty-six:

For expenses of detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons engaged in perpetrating frauds upon the United States, to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to dispose of the property received from the rebel steamer Florida, and distribute the proceeds thereof as other prize money is required by law to be distributed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have some explanation of that amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. It will be remembered that in the harbor of Bahia, in Brazil, the rebel steamer Florida was captured by the captain of the United States ship Wachusett, and she was brought to American waters, and was lying in Hampton Roads, and by one of those mysterious dispensations of Providence, which two military or naval courts-martial have been unable satisfactorily to account for, she was sunk by an Army transport. Before she was sunk, about fourteen thousand dollars' worth of property—that is the whole amount that is involved—had been taken from her. I have a list of the property on my desk; and it is proposed that half that property which is now in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy shall be distributed between Captain Collins and the officers and crew of the Wachusett as other prize property is distributed, the other half going into the naval pension fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on page 3, from line fifty-eight to line sixty-two was adopted. I have another proposition which, if this motion prevails, I shall offer to cover both those clauses.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no objection to that.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ANTHONY. I now move to amend the bill by striking out all from line fifty-four to line sixty-two, which will include the amendment of the committee, in the following words:

For the purpose of printing and publishing at the Government Printing Office the first volumes of the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion, under the direction of the Surgeon General, $60,000.

For the preparation, printing, and publishing at the Government Printing Office of the report of the medical statistics in the Bureau of the Provost Marshal General, to be prepared under the direction of Surgeon J. H. Baxter, $60,000.

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

For the purpose of preparing for publication, under the direction of the Secretary of War, and of printing at the Government Printing Office, five thousand copies of the first volume of the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion, compiled by the Surgeon General, and for the purpose of preparing for publication, under the direction of the Secretary of War, and of printing at the Government Printing Office, five thousand copies of the medical statistics of the Provost Marshal General's Bureau, compiled and to be completed by Surgeon J. H. Baxter, $60,000: Provided, That the editions of both publications, thus ordered, shall be disposed of as Congress may hereafter direct: And provided further, That the necessary engraving and lithographing for these publications may be executed under the direction of the Secretary of War, without advertisement.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is $60,000 appropriated for both works?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. Do you say that $60,000 is necessary?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think $60,000 is necessary. Sixty thousand dollars was sufficient to print the first volume of the Medical History and to pay for the printing of it. We have now provided that the printing shall be done at the Government Printing Office. At the same time, the work is to be done under the direction of the Secretary of War, and it is not likely that any more will be expended than is necessary. There is a general law which requires that all engraving, when the estimated amount exceeds $250, shall be advertised for, and given out to the lowest and best bidder. This engraving is of a peculiar character. But very few persons are capable of doing it, and those are persons who have been specially instructed in the Surgeon General's office; and it seemed proper, therefore, that this provision of law should be waived in this instance.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like now to finish the committee's amendments, and so I will ask the Senate to turn back to the amendment for the Providence hospital and have that disposed of. But before doing that, as this bill is under consideration, I have received and desire to present a petition from a large number of property holders and citizens of Georgetown, praying Congress to continue the appropriations for this year for lighting Bridge and High streets, in that town. I wish to present it now, and have it laid upon the table, as the consideration of it must come up on this bill, if at all. The House has struck out of this appropriation bill everything for lighting Bridge and High streets, in Georgetown, and it must be put on this bill, if at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The petition will be received, by unanimous consent, and laid on the table. The question now is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance, to strike out, after line four hundred and eighty-two, the following clause:

Providence hospital, District of Columbia:

For the purpose of aiding in the erection of an additional building to the Providence hospital, in the city of Washington, $30,000: Provided, That if the said property should ever be sold or diverted from the uses expressed in the act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate Providence hospital, of the city of Washington, District of Columbia," approved April 8, 1864, then the sum of $30,000 shall be first paid out of the proceeds thereof into the United States Treasury to reimburse the sum hereby appropriated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the clause proposed to be stricken out by inserting after the word "dollars" in line four hundred and eighty-six the following proviso—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The question now is simply on concurring in the amendment of the committee striking out that clause. If it is stricken out, that additional proviso will not be necessary, but if it remains in the bill, that proviso should be added to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know the precise stage of the bill, but the Committee on Finance reported an amendment striking out the appropriation for the Providence hospital. The appropriation as it stood was objectionable in some particulars, and to obviate those objections I have drawn an amendment. I will therefore move, before the amendment of the Committee on Finance is acted upon, to strike out the proviso and insert in lieu thereof what I will send to the Chair.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Would it not be better to put it in as the first proviso, leaving the one now in to stand?

Mr. SHERMAN. It will do in lieu of the proviso. I think it covers the whole ground. It is to strike out all of the proviso commencing in line eight hundred and forty-six and to insert:

Provided, That no portion of said sum shall be expended until the plan of such building shall be submitted to the architect of the Capitol extension, and he shall certify that it is well adapted to the purpose contemplated, and that its cost will exceed $60,000; and said sum of $30,000 shall be paid in installments as equal amounts derived from other sources shall be expended on said building; and the said building is hereby dedicated to the relief of sick and indigent persons without distinction as to creed or color, and shall remain under the care of the Sisters of Charity as incorporated under an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Providence hospital of the city of Washington, District of Columbia," approved April 8, 1864.

The history of this charity, as near as I can learn from the ladies who have charge of it, is this: the Sisters of Charity undertook to relieve the transient sick and disabled persons in the District of Columbia. Some few years ago Congress appropriated a small sum for the relief of sixty patients under their care, a sum barely sufficient to pay at that time the expenses of sixty patients. That sum has been continued from that time to this. The sum then appropriated was insufficient to pay the expenses of sixty patients. Those patients are sent to the charity by the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds, and by other public officers, and mostly persons connected with the Government.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We doubled the appropriation last year and this.

Mr. SHERMAN. And we doubled the number of patients, also.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. That appropriation has been passed for several years. Last year, during last summer, on account of the vast increase of persons of this character, they formed a plan to build a building costing $90,000, $60,000 of which they expect to get from other sources and $30,000 they ask from the Government of the United States. Two years ago, under the act of April 8, 1864, this charity was incorporated by a special act, entitled "An act to incorporate the Providence hospital of the city of Washington, District of Columbia." That act incorporated four or five of these Sisters of Charity by name as an incorporation.

When this proposition came before the Committee on Finance the objection was made, first, that there was no guarantee that any money would be paid by anybody else except by the United States, and that probably the ladies would only have the $30,000 and expend that, and then would call upon the Government for more. I have obviated that objection by requiring the money to be paid only in installments, and as they expend an equal amount derived from other sources. It was objected, too, that the fund might be diverted from the purpose which was designed by Congress, and that this being a corporation solely under the control of the Sisters of Charity, it might be diverted to a different purpose. I have endeavored to guard against that by declaring that this building shall be dedicated to the uses named, for the use of indigent persons, and that it shall be under the control and management of the Sisters of Charity. I have guarded it as far as I can.

Now, in regard to the general charity, from all the representations that have been made to me, I think it is one of the most deserving objects to which Congress could grant aid. If we grant charity in any case, we ought to do so in a case of this kind. The number of transient sick here has, since the war, very largely increased; and it seems to me we ought to do something for them. These ladies represent to me that very often drunken people are brought there, black and white, and they are relieved promptly without regard to their creed and without regard to their condition. Very many persons are brought there in a very destitute state, and taken care of until employment is found for them. From all the representations that have been made to me by the ladies themselves, and by other persons who have no interest in this charity, I have no doubt it is one of the most deserving and useful that can commend itself to the attention of Congress. My impression is, that with the limitations contained in this proviso, the charity would be a wise one, and that we ought to contribute at least one third toward this charity. Without this they cannot construct the buildings that are necessary for the increased number of patients that will naturally come to them.

Mr. MORRILL. Perhaps, in addition to what I said yesterday, I ought to call the attention of the Senate to the charter of this institution. I am only desirous that the Senate should understand precisely what they are doing. It will lay the foundation for other appropriations which I intend to urge. If the Senate adopt this principle, I shall not complain of it, and I do not intend to argue against it. The Senate must judge for itself whether this is the kind of charity which addresses itself to the Treasury of the United States. This is a private corporation in the strictest sense. It is not a public corporation in any sense whatever. The Government of the United States has no control over it in any way. It is not responsible for it; and so far as these rights of these parties are concerned, they are entirely independent of it, and it was so designed to be. I will refer to the charter. It will be seen by the first section of the charter that certain females, five in number, I think, are associated with the ordinary powers granted to similar private corporations, and with the power—

"To have, purchase, receive, possess, and enjoy any estate in lands, tenements, annuities, goods, chattels, moneys, or effects, and to grant, devise, or dispose of the same in such manner as they may deem most for the interest of the hospital: Provided, That the real estate held by said corporation shall not exceed in value the sum of $150,000."

The next section declares the object:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation and body-politic shall have full power to appoint from their own body a president and such other officers as they may deem necessary for the purpose of their creation; and in case of the death, resignation, or refusal to serve, of any of their number, the remaining members shall elect and appoint other persons in lieu of those whose places may have been vacated; and the corporation shall have full power and all the rights of opening and keeping a hospital in the city of Washington for the care of such sick and invalid persons as may place themselves under the treatment and care of the said corporation."

The third and last section is in these words:

"That the said corporation shall also have and enjoy full power and authority to make such by-laws, rules, and regulations as may be necessary for the general accomplishment of the object of said hospital: Provided, That they be not inconsistent with the laws in force in the District of Columbia: And provided further, That this act shall be liable to be amended, altered, or repealed, at the pleasure of Congress."

When this bill was passed, it was proposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, who desired to make the institution amenable to the public, to provide that it should be liable to visitations on the part of the public authorities, and the bill was reported accordingly. But that was said to be objectionable. It was said that this was simply an object of private charity, and these persons wished to associate themselves together in this way for the better facility of transacting the business, but did not make it a public institution, and they did not desire the intervention of the public in its affairs; and that an attempt to do so would destroy the objects which the parties had in view. Regarding it in that light the committee consented to have the amendment stricken out. I say this to advertise the Senate of the fact that it is, in the strictest sense, a private corporation, in no way under the control of the Government of the United States; nor does this amendment subject them to our visitation nor to our control in any way whatever. That the object is worthy, I do not doubt; that these Sisters of Charity are ladies of the highest respectability and worth there is no doubt; but the question still is, whether the Committee on Finance intend to recommend the endowment of simply private charities or private corporations associated in this way, over which we have no control. I believe this is all I have occasion to say.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that I have any particular objection to this proposition taken by itself; but as my colleague gives me notice that if it passes he is to offer two or three more just like it from the Committee on the District of Columbia to endow two or three other institutions, which probably have just as much claim as this one, I suppose it becomes the Senate to pause a little before granting this amount of money.

The objection that he stated strikes me with a great deal of force. I think that it might be right enough for Congress to endow an institution of this description fairly and liberally; but I think with him that if Congress is to appropriate so much money to erect buildings for the purpose of establishing the hospital, it should have some power of supervision of its concerns, some right of visitation. It is a mere private corporation. After we have appropriated this money and assisted in the erection of the building, and done it out of the public purse, the result is that we have no control whatever over it in any possible way, and all control and interference as to its management or a part of its management is denied to the Government or to any officer of the Government, although we are called upon to make the appropriation.

I think myself that the great objection is the hasty manner in which it is brought up. It should have been laid before Congress with a proper bill and with proper provisions guarding the rights of the public in it, if the public is to make the appropriation. So far as the appropriation of $12,000 a year, which we make to pay for the support of certain paupers in this institution, is concerned, that is all well enough. It has been done without objection. I aided in doubling the amount which was appropriated for that purpose in some bill that we passed very recently; I do not remember exactly when. But here is an appropriation of $30,000 to erect a new building. I did not understand from the statement that was made to me by these ladies that the building would cost $90,000. From the somewhat careful inquiries I made, I arrived at a different conclusion about that, and that this appropriation would be about one half, and more than one half in fact, of what it would cost to erect the building.

Now, it is for the Senate to decide. For myself, although under proper circumstances and with proper guards and with the rights of the public secured, if the public money is to be appropriated for the purpose, I should not be averse to doing fairly what the Government ought to do with reference to institutions of this kind in the District, yet I think that this matter is rather hasty and is not sufficiently taken care of. So far as I am concerned I am not disposed to vary from the report of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to make one suggestion as to the argument offered by the Senator from Maine to show that this appropriation ought not to be made. No one, I suppose, doubts that it is necessary that there should be hospital accommodations in the city of Washington. Nobody doubts that it is the duty of Congress to make some provision to establish and maintain such an hospital. Now, it does not seem to me to be altogether logical to say that because Congress does provide what is necessary for the wants of the people of the District, therefore Congress must make every other appropriation that is asked for, whether such appropriation be or not necessary for such purposes. If the argument offered by the Senator from Maine is to have its effect, then there is to be no hospital in the District of Columbia at all, unless it can be managed by private persons out of private funds, and I understand the argument to be that if any appropriation be made for any hospital, then an appropriation will be asked for two or three hospitals or more; and the inference is that no appropriation ought to be made at all and there ought not to be any hospital here at all for the accommodation of the people.

Now, sir, I think that Congress may, with perfect propriety, make an appropriation for this hospital, and refuse to make any other appropriation for a similar purpose unless Congress is satisfied that other appropriations are necessary and that this appropriation is not sufficient to meet the wants of the people in this District. If that is apparent, then, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to make all appropriations of this nature that are necessary, that are required by the indigence and misfortunes of those that may be found in this District.

I was inclined, for the want of information, to vote in the committee to strike this provision from the bill, not knowing anything about it; but since that time I have received information which satisfies me that this provision ought to be made, that Congress cannot expend this amount of money for any other purpose that will do as much good as it will to provide for the construction of this building. The ladies that have charge of this charity have commenced the construction of a building, as I understand; they have appropriated some four thousand dollars; the building is partly finished; it is necessary that they should have funds to go on and complete the building; they ask Congress simply to appropriate a part of the necessary funds, and they say that the present accommodations are not sufficient. They have rented a house, comparatively a small house; they find that it is not sufficiently large and commodious for the purpose of a hospital, and they desire to put up a building for that purpose, one that will be sufficiently large and suitable for such a purpose. I have understood—I do not know but that I may be mistaken—that this is the only hospital in this city that is now receiving persons and is in actual operation. But the Senator from Maine said that there was another hospital, and perhaps in that respect I am misinformed. It seems to me that we might with propriety make this appropriation, and then decide on the propriety of others when application for them is made.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Oregon misapprehends me entirely. I have not argued that it was not the duty of Congress to endow a hospital here. I have said simply that this was a private corporation to administer charity on its own account, and that the question is, whether the Congress of the United States will endow such institutions. Now, to illustrate, here are five maiden ladies, I believe, corporators. Suppose they were not associated by the act, but were doing precisely what they are doing under the act of incorporation, and applied here, setting forth the fact that they had a private hospital, would Congress grant them $30,000 in this bill? Would Congress grant them $30,000 if they were not incorporated? Congress would not consider it for one moment. Does it change the case at all that you have associated them by act of incorporation, by the terms of which you have no control over them? They stand precisely, so far as the Government of the United States is concerned, as they would if they were associated by articles of association. You have no power of visitation, no power of supervision.

Now, sir, that we ought not to endow an institution here of this sort I have not argued; but I maintain that if Congress is to endow an institution it should be one over which it has control, over which it has supervision, and into which it has a right to enter. That is my doctrine. I say that if you are going to vote these miscellaneous charities to institutions over which you have no control, I do not object, but it is a gratuity; it is a charity; the object is worthy. If you can afford to lavish it, very well; but I had supposed that the appropriations you would feel authorized to make were to your own institutions, to an institution which was a public institution by an act of your own, over which you had some control and supervision. That is the distinction I undertake to make.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Such as the Insane Asylum.

Mr. MORRILL. Yes. For instance, you appropriate about one hundred thousand dollars for the insane. That is a charitable object, but you have the supervision and control of that asylum. So of the appropriation of seventy-odd thousand dollars in this bill for the deaf and dumb. There you have control. We have a bill before the Senate for which I shall ask the consideration of the Senate, to-night, for another public charity; that is, a House of Refuge for juvenile offenders. I might go on and enumerate the charitable institutions which you have under your control. I am not sure that you ought not to endow a hospital here; but there is another side to that question which I hoped I should not be called upon to argue, and that is this: while you are in this very bill granting to the public charities of this District over two hundred thousand dollars, the query is whether you have not gone far enough to justify you in putting upon the local corporations of these cities the duty of doing something toward these charities. It is here proposed to grant to a private corporation over which you have no control, to an institution organized under an act of incorporation granted to five maiden ladies, $30,000 to be used for erecting a building just as they please, to be governed and directed by such rules and regulations as they shall make, you having no right to interfere, no right to ask a report, no right of visitation, no right of supervision. In addition to this $30,000, you give, in the same bill, $12,000 for the support of sixty transient persons, whom you may put there, or anywhere else you see fit, which, I submit to my honorable friend from Ohio, is a pretty large compensation for the support of transient persons in a hospital. It is $200 apiece, which is amply abundant for their support.

If I am understood, this is all I desire to say. I wished to impress on the Senate that the charity which we are bestowing is not to one of our institutions. It is a case where some half a dozen public-spirited and charitable ladies come here and ask you to give them $30,000 to carry out their worthy object. That is all there is about it. All I meant to say was that there was not another institution here of a similar character which I think I can satisfy the Senate is quite as worthy of their favor as this which is before us, and which has done something and would be glad to do more in this direction; but it is not a public institution, and for that reason the Committee on the District of Columbia hesitated to make a recommendation, and only authorized me to make it upon the ground that it should be the sense of the Senate that they would endow institutions over which they had no control.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is really no difficult question involved in this appropriation. There is no doubt about our power to appropriate money for the support of hospitals in the District of Columbia. The only question is, whether this is a proper application. I will state to the Senator from Maine that it is no objection to me that this is a private corporation, a private charity. On the other hand my observation of these charities has always been in favor of those managed by private charitable persons. Public hospitals, poor-houses, asylums of various kinds, are very apt to be mismanaged. I would much rather give money to these Sisters of Charity who have devoted their lives by a religious vow to disbursing money for such a purpose honestly and fairly, than I would trust paid officers at from $600 to $2,000 a year to dole out charity upon a salary.

We have several securities for the proper management of this fund that we have not in ordinary charities. The character of the ladies concerned, the fact that they are persons who by their religious vows have been set apart in a measure, and devote their whole lives to charitable and religious purposes, is sufficient always to give some kind of assurance that the money will be honestly bestowed. Sometimes it is objected that persons of a particular religious creed will misapply the money merely for their own church and their own people. We have guarded against anything like that in the act of appropriation and in the grant of money by providing that there shall be no distinction made in the application of the money either on account of creed or color. Then the fact that private contributions of equal amount have to be contributed is also another security. That to which charitable persons are willing to give their money we ought to contribute something to. These ladies inform me that they have arrangements made by which they get $60,000, part of it on credit, but most of it in gratuities, outside of this appropriation, and that their plans and estimates contemplated the expenditure of $30,000. I therefore, in pursuance of an intimation in the Committee on Finance, provided in this amendment that the money shall only be paid by the Government as an equal amount shall be paid from private sources. It may be that these ladies may be deceived in regard to the amount that they will get from private sources; but they assure me that they have made a contract with a well-known contractor of this city, and other persons, providing for an expenditure of $60,000, to be derived from other sources, and that this $30,000 will enable them to complete their building.

It was also objected that there was no plan made, that this money might be wasted on some idle or illusory plan; but it is sufficient to say that a plan has been prepared by the architect of the Capitol extension, a man entirely competent for the business, that it is certainly a very beautiful one, and contemplates an expenditure of $90,000. Before the money which we appropriate is paid, the plan is to be submitted to the present architect of the Capitol, Mr. Clark. This amendment provides that the plan shall be submitted to the architect and approved by him; and that he shall certify that it is adapted to the purpose, and that the building will cost more than $60,000.

Under these circumstances, it seems to me we cannot do better than to vote this money to this charity. These ladies have been in the successful management of this charity for now seven years. My impression is that it originated in Providence, Rhode Island, by a small gratuity given to these ladies to establish a charity in the city of Washington, and it has been added to, little by little, as these ladies could get money from private sources; and up to this time the Government of the United States has never paid one dollar except for actual pay for persons sent there by the Government to be supported and cared for. The best way in which the officer charged with the expenditure of the money appropriated for the support of transient paupers could expend it was by sending those transient paupers to the care of these ladies. There is no law requiring the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds to send transient paupers to the Providence hospital; but that institution has been selected by the officer merely because it is deemed best to send them there. The appropriation for that object does not require that the sixty transient paupers for whom the Government pays shall be sent to any particular hospital. They may be sent to any other hospital; but the Commissioner of Public Buildings has found that he can make better arrangements with these ladies than with any other institution. Up to this time the United States have never paid one dollar to this charity except to pay the simple allowance for actual services rendered to persons sent there and taken up by those in charge of your grounds, such as drunken persons, &c., in the most filthy and detestable condition. They are taken there, cleansed, taken care of, fed, clothed, and relieved at an expense that to the extent of sixty patients is paid by the United States Government; all the rest is paid for by these ladies with such contributions as they can gather from their church and charitable persons.

It seems to me if there ever was a case appealing to the mercy and to the charitable sentiment of Congress, this is the one. Indeed, I would much prefer that the Sisters would come here and plead their cause themselves rather than have me to do it for them. I am sure that if the Senate could see these Sisters and hear their story and see their anxiety for this little appropriation to enable them to complete a cherished object of their life, they would not hesitate about making the appropriation. It is not money for them. My friend from Maine seems to think that because they are incorporated here, it is some way or other for their benefit. Not at all. They are persons belonging to a well-known religious order; they devote their lives to purposes of this kind; they expend their whole time in what one would suppose to be most distasteful employment; and they have it at heart to build up this charity and make it a permanent and conspicuous charity in the District of Columbia. Because they are incorporated as a mere private institution, because this is a mere private charity, that is no reason why we should not vote them the money. I would rather vote them the $30,000 than to give $10,000 every year to build and extend the wall around any asylum here.

I am disposed, therefore, to give them this appropriation, and if the Senator from Maine finds another case under similar circumstances where private individuals are willing to contribute an equal amount for an equally charitable purpose, I am willing to vote money to them, although I do not think that because one appropriation is asked for others ought to be.

Mr. ANTHONY. The main objection to this charity seems to be that the managers of it are doing something for themselves instead of calling upon Congress to do the whole, as in the case of the other charities that we are contributing to. It does not seem to me that the Senator from Maine at the head of the Finance Committee manifests his usual persistence when he is willing to give up a deserving charity because his colleague at the head of the Committee on the District of Columbia says that if this passes, he means to propose a great many others which will not meet his approbation.

In the course of his speech he said that at this evening session, which is to be devoted to District of Columbia business, he means to bring forward these other charities, whether this passes or not.

Mr. MORRILL. Oh, no!

Mr. ANTHONY. I understood that the Senator was to bring forward a number of other institutions as the recipients of public bounty.

Mr. MORRILL. What I undertook to say—and if the Senator had paid a little attention to me perhaps I should not have occasion now to repeat it—was, that I did not rise to oppose this appropriation, but to say that it was a private charity, or contribution to a private corporation, and that there was another private corporation of a similar character asking the same thing, and that the District of Columbia Committee had not granted it, and had not concluded to grant it, except on the condition that the precedent was established of granting these bounties to private charities. That is all I said. I did not say it by way of menace, and I did not say it by way of argument to induce the Senate not to enter upon this system.

Mr. ANTHONY. It seemed to have that effect upon the Senator who had charge of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I think in the fact there is legitimate argument, and I think there is legitimate force in the fact. It presents the question whether the Senate of the United States will endow institutions in which they have no interest and over which they have no control.

Mr. ANTHONY. The question is whether we shall endow charitable institutions which can help themselves, whether we shall give $30,000 to the managers of an institution that raise $60,000 themselves, or whether we shall give all our bounty to those institutions that do nothing for themselves.

Mr. GRIMES. What are those institutions?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Deaf and Dumb Asylum and the Insane Asylum. Seventy-five thousand dollars is appropriated in this bill, and very properly, I think, for the deaf and dumb.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Private individuals have done nothing for those. They are Government institutions.

Mr. ANTHONY. Here is an institution which renders a most valuable charity. I believe it was at one time the only institution in which colored people here could have hospital accommodations.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think this is the only institution in the District of Columbia where transient persons can be taken for immediate care. There are many cases of drunkenness, for instance, where transient persons are taken in.

Mr. ANTHONY. And the funds to support it are derived, I understand, mainly from private contributions.

Mr. GRIMES. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that the Insane Hospital is designed to accommodate the officers and soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy of the United States, and they are brought there from all over this continent.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true.

Mr. GRIMES. So that there is no analogy between that case and this.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the Deaf and Dumb Institution presents an analogous case, certainly.

Mr. GRIMES. The Deaf and Dumb Institution presents rather an interesting subject for contemplation. When I was a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia we thought about nine thousand dollars a year was a large appropriation for the Deaf and Dumb Asylum. We enlarged it twice, I think, while I was a member of that committee, and built a very valuable building; but I see it is now proposed to make an appropriation of $72,000. It may be all right; I do not pretend to know anything about it; I only see that we are increasing, with most extraordinary rapidity, the appropriations for that institution.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not wish to weary the patience of the Senate. I simply desire to be understood. Every time the Committee on the District of Columbia meet we have an application for these private acts of incorporation. Some enterprising gentlemen or some half a dozen enterprising, charitable ladies desirous to do good, wish to be associated for that end; we think it harmless and we do it; but at the very next session of Congress they come in and ask to be endowed. Now, you will find that at this very session there are several such applications; I only allude to them now to illustrate the argument; there are one or two I shall bring up to-night. They do not ask any endowment; but pass this appropriation and all of them will come in here for endowment. I will mention one that I am not sure ought not to be endowed. There are very highly respectable ladies, not only in this District, but resident in many other sections of the country, asking to be incorporated for the purpose of erecting an asylum for the orphans of soldiers and sailors. We have reported a bill to incorporate them. They do not ask any appropriation; they ask to be associated simply for the better facility of transacting business; but is anybody so blind as not to see that enter upon this policy and you will be asked for $200,000 to erect a building and endow it, and you cannot resist it?

I do not wish to be put in the attitude of opposing these appropriations as gratuities to worthy objects and to worthy individuals. I only want the Senate to understand the question and to vote upon it understandingly, so that hereafter when these institutions come before the committee which I have the honor to be upon, we shall know what the policy of the Senate is.

Mr. JOHNSON. The amendment proposed by my friend from Ohio, perhaps, will not accomplish, in one respect, the object which he has; I refer to that part of the amendment which provides that the building is to be considered as dedicated hereafter to the particular charity. I suggest to him that it would be as well to make the acceptance of the appropriation an agreement upon the part of the corporation that that shall be a dedication of it. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Provided, That no portion of said sum shall be expended until the plan of said building is submitted to the architect of the Capitol extension and he shall certify that it is well adapted to the purpose contemplated and that its cost will exceed $60,000; and said sum of $30,000 shall only be paid in installments as an equal amount derived from other sources shall be expended on said building; and the said building is hereby dedicated to the relief of sick and indigent persons, without distinction as to creed or color, and shall remain under the care of the Sisters of Charity as incorporated under the act entitled "An act to incorporate Providence hospital in the city of Washington, District of Columbia," approved April 8, 1864.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to strike out the words, "and the said building is hereby" and to insert "and if the said hospital company accept this appropriation it shall be held as an agreement on their part that the building is forever to be considered and held;" so as to read:

And said sum of $30,000 shall be paid in installments as an equal amount derived from other sources shall be expended on said building, and if the said hospital company accept this appropriation it shall be held as an agreement on their part that the building is forever to be considered and held dedicated to the relief of sick and indigent persons, without distinction as to creed or color, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The amendment is accepted by the mover.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I ask the Senator from Ohio whether it ought not to be expressed that the relief given by this hospital is to transient persons. I understand this hospital is not for the benefit of persons living in the city of Washington, but for persons coming from various quarters.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would not limit them. They may wish to extend the charity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is intended for both classes.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. My object is precisely the reverse of what the Senator from Ohio supposes. I thought it was calling on them for more than they had undertaken or were willing to undertake.

Mr. SHERMAN. I showed the amendment to the ladies and they were perfectly satisfied with the condition of it. This does not change the meaning; it simply makes it a condition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Do I understand that the amendment is adopted and the appropriation rejected? Is that the result of the vote?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The question was on concurring with the report of the committee, which was to strike out the clause. The first question, therefore, should be taken on that. If the Senate refuse to concur, then the amendment is in order.

Mr. ANTHONY. The question was not understood.

Mr. SHERMAN. I had a right to perfect the clause before it was stricken out. I offered in that view to amend the part proposed to be stricken out. That has been adopted; and now the question recurs on striking out the whole clause as amended.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is whether the whole clause, as amended, shall be stricken out.

The motion to strike out was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer this amendment to come in at the end of the second section of the bill:

To pay bounties to the loyal owners of slaves mustered into the military service of the United States according to the act of Congress approved February 24, 1864, $5,000,000.

Mr. SUMNER. Inquire whether that comes from any committee.

Mr. DAVIS. It does not.

Mr. SUMNER. I presume then it is not in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I think it is in order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I raise the question.

Mr. DAVIS. I will discuss that question.

Mr. SUMNER. I call for the reading of the rule.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, I will read the law.

Mr. SUMNER. The rule first, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. DAVIS. The law first, the rule afterward. I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts will not deny that the rule allows any appropriation to be moved as an amendment that is in pursuance of law.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the reading of the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule will be read.

The Secretary read the thirtieth rule, as follows:

"30. No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments; and no amendments shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or treaty stipulation."

Mr. DAVIS. Now, I will read the law. The twenty-fourth section of the act of February 24, 1864, provides:

"SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That all able-bodied male colored persons between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of this act and of the act to which this is an amendment, and form part of the national forces; and when a slave of a loyal master shall be drafted and mustered into the service of the United States, his master shall have a certificate thereof, and thereupon such slave shall be free; and the bounties of $100 now payable by law for each drafted man shall be paid to the person to whom such drafted person was owing service or labor at the time of his muster into the service of the United States. The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress, charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation, not exceeding $300, for each such colored volunteer, payable out of the fund derived from commutations; and every such colored volunteer on being mustered into the service shall be free."

It is provided by this law that these bounties shall be paid out of a particular fund; but by the operation of the laws regulating the Treasury that fund has fallen into the Treasury and is now a general fund belonging to the United States. A special appropriation, then, is necessary to direct the officers of the Treasury to pay this money. I therefore offer the amendment and will suspend my remarks to enable the Chair to decide whether it is in order or not.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky by substituting for it the following:

That so much of any moneys in the Treasury known as the commutation fund as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the payment to loyal persons claiming service or labor from colored volunteers or drafted men the amounts heretofore or hereafter to be awarded them under the provisions of section twenty-four of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,'" approved February 24, 1864, for each person so claimed to be held to service or labor who has enlisted or been drafted into the military service of the United States. But such payment shall in no case be made to any person except upon satisfactory proof that the claimant has firmly and faithfully maintained his or her adherence and allegiance to the Government of the United States by defending its cause against the Government and forces of the so-called confederate States of America in all suitable and practicable ways and according to his or her ability or opportunity.

Mr. DAVIS. But for the tail of that amendment I should have no objection to it. If the honorable Senator will just strike out two or three lines I shall have no objection; but it seems to me it is, as it stands, imposing conditions that did not exist by the law and were not imposed by the law as it passed. That law simply provided that every loyal owner of slaves enlisted into the Army should receive the bounty. I think the honorable Senator might adopt the language of the original law. If he does so I have no objection to accepting his amendments as a substitute for my own proposition.

Mr. WILSON. This case is a very singular one, and yet one that I suppose must be met and honestly dealt with. We passed an act in 1864 which provided that slaves enlisting into the service of the United States should be, when mustered into that service, free by the act of the Federal Government, and that the owners or claimants to the services of such persons should receive a sum not exceeding $300. That sum was to be fixed in each State by commissioners appointed for that purpose. The provision was originally put in the bill in the House of Representatives as an amendment to the Senate bill. The provision as originally prepared was that colored persons, free or slave, should be enrolled and might be drafted, being liable to military duty; that when they were drafted the owner of each slave should receive the bounty of $100 on making this person free. It also provided that if a colored man who was held as a slave should enlist into the service of the United States his master should receive the sum of $300 when he made him free. That was the action of the House of Representatives. The bill went to a committee of conference. I was upon that committee on the part of the Senate, and it struck me that it would be a dishonor to our country to have a slave in the service of the United States. We all wanted colored men to fight for the country, but we did not want them to be slaves with the uniform upon them and fighting under the flag of the United States; and in that committee of conference I moved that the slave, on being mustered into the service of the United States, should be free, be free by the fiat of the Federal Government, and that left the law in this form: that instead of the slave who was drafted or the slave who enlisted becoming free at the will of the master, he became free by the law, by the will of the nation, and the master was allowed $100 if the slave was drafted and a sum not exceeding $300 if he enlisted into the service, and the amount in the latter case was to be fixed by a commission appointed by the Secretary of War. That is the history of this law of the 24th of February, 1864. We wanted these colored men, free and slave, to enlist into our armies, to augment our military forces to put down the rebellion, and we wanted also to demoralize and break up and destroy slavery in the border States. That was the motive of the action of Congress. It was the motive that governed me in the matter. I wanted to strengthen the Army; I wanted to weaken and destroy slavery; and under the provisions of that act, in the State of Kentucky alone, about twenty-four or twenty-five thousand men entered the service of the United States as volunteers, perhaps twenty thousand of them were slaves, and the moment they were mustered into the service they became forever free; and this was followed by a bill that freed nearly one hundred thousand of their wives and their children. We abolished slavery since that day.

When we passed this act we thought it was an act to strengthen the Army and an act to weaken slavery that was the enemy of the country. We provided that a sum not exceeding $300, to be fixed by a commission, should be paid to the persons claiming the services of these slaves. We have abolished slavery since, and I do not believe any commission could award or ought to award to any of the persons who claimed to hold the service and labor of these enlisted men the sum of $300, for less than two years from the time they entered the service of the United States the constitutional amendment was adopted, and they would have been freed by the adoption of that amendment.

Now, sir, I do not think that this provision, that the claimants of these persons should be loyal persons, should have been actively loyal, should have been against the confederate government, is an unreasonable one. We all know that many slave-owners were disloyal; and the greater portion of the claimants to these slaves in the States of Maryland, Kentucky, Delaware, West Virginia, and Missouri, were disloyal. We in this District had a sample of this matter. We provided in this District for the payment of $300 for the emancipated slaves, and I do not know a single owner of a slave in the District who was not loyal when the Government would pay $300 for his slave; and they made their claims; and on examining that record we shall come to the conclusion that many of the slaveholders in the District of Columbia, who never drew a loyal breath in their lives, did not before the war nor since the war, and do not now, took the money of the United States, and professed to be loyal persons.

I think the provision in this amendment is reasonable, and if the amendment is adopted, I think it should go with it. Nothing can be paid under this amendment until the Secretary of War has appointed the commissioners who are to examine these cases and report on them, and I do not think any commission would report an average of $300 for these persons, considering that slavery has been abolished by the Constitution of the United States.

But, sir, we intended to pay when we passed the act; I am sure I did. I wanted the men, and I equally wanted to destroy the institution of slavery, especially in the State of Kentucky, where slavery was strong and defiant. I wanted to demoralize it, to break it down, to destroy it; and no act of this Government ever did so much to demoralize and to destroy slavery, except the constitutional amendment, as the passage of this section of this bill on the 24th day of February, 1864, and that other act making the wives and children of these persons free. I say that when the act was passed I expected to vote for proper compensation, such compensation as should be reported by honest and fair-minded commissioners who should examine the subject and report upon it, and the fact that we have abolished slavery since by constitutional amendment, I do not think releases me from paying (not so much as I expected then) the really loyal claimants some consideration for declaring that their slaves when they entered the service of the United States should forever more be freemen.

Mr. CRESWELL. I prefer the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the original proposition as presented by the Senator from Kentucky. The amendment as suggested to the amendment does nothing in my judgment but define the meaning of the word "loyalty," which I think it is competent for Congress to do. A wide latitude of interpretation has prevailed of late, and it is well enough, I think, for us to give that word a more specific operation and bearing than has generally been conceded to it. If the Senator from Kentucky will examine the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts he will find it more comprehensive than his own amendment. The twenty-fourth section of the act of 1864, approved February 24, provides specifically that the commutation fund shall be dedicated to the compensation of loyal slave-owners whose slaves shall be mustered or drafted into the service of the United States. Now, while the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky takes $5,000,000 from the Treasury for that purpose, the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts goes against the specific fund that is by this law expressly appropriated for the payment of these claims. In my judgment nothing would be necessary to accomplish the purpose which is sought by this proposition if it were not that a technical difficulty has presented itself. It has been asserted by some that the commutation fund is now in the Treasury of the United States, and that some specific act of appropriation is necessary to withdraw that fund from the Treasury so that these parties can reach it. There can be no objection urged against the payment of this money, more than was urged against the payment of money in the shape of compensation when emancipation was effected in the District of Columbia. If the payment of that money had been delayed until after the adoption of the amendment of the Constitution declaring universal emancipation, it would seem to me that we could not stand here as honest men and claim that we had faithfully performed our contract, if we refused to pay, the people here having complied with the necessary conditions. In Maryland this proposition was presented to the people as one which came from the loyal men in Congress with a view, as the Senator from Massachusetts has already suggested, as well to induce the enlistment of the colored people, and to bring to the assistance of the Army then in the field the entire array of the colored men in the State of Maryland, as also to strike a blow at the institution of slavery; and I frankly avow that my course in the House of Representatives at that time was directed so as to accomplish both these objects. I believe that this twenty-fourth section—and my practical experience leads me to the belief—was in fact the forerunner of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery everywhere; that above all other measures, it prepared the minds of the people of the State of Maryland for the coming change; and reconciled them to and in some measure compensated them for the losses incident to the transition from slave labor to free labor.

Mr. President, if this were a new proposition, I am frank to say I should much hesitate about voting for it, yet believing that the faith of this Government has been pledged and deliberately pledged for the payment of this money as much as for any other, I cannot feel it consistent with my sense of duty and my obligations as a Senator of the United States, to refuse to pay these people their money, when they have complied with every condition that was made precedent to their right to receive it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand the gentleman to insist that that law makes a contract between Congress and the slaveholders? If I understand the terms of the law these negroes were drafted.

Mr. CRESWELL. No, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They were taken by the power of the United States.

Mr. CRESWELL. The gentleman is mistaken. The negroes volunteered, and many of them were placed in the Army by their masters themselves, expecting to receive compensation under this clause. Some gentlemen seem to entertain the idea that every slaveholder is a barbarian, but that is altogether a mistaken notion. Although I was never a slave-holder myself, my father and grandfather were both slaveholders, and I am sure in many respects they were better men than I am. They were honest slaveholders, just as there were other honest people; and there are men in Maryland to-day who, notwithstanding their ownership of slaves, have stood by this Government in every emergency, and who have aided to the full extent of their influence in bringing about the grand result of emancipation. There are men in Maryland to-day, loyal men, as loyal as any in the land, who if they do not receive from the Government the pittance which is pledged to them by this twenty-fourth section will be penniless, although at the beginning of the war they perhaps could have counted their possessions by thousands.

I have a report in my hand made by the Secretary of War to the Senate some time ago in reply to a resolution of inquiry which I had the honor to offer, in which he makes these statements:

"1. That commissioners were appointed in the States of Maryland and Delaware, and that in the other slave States, by the President's direction, no appointments have been made.

"2. That the sums awarded by the commissioners in Maryland and Delaware, and the amount paid thereon, are set forth in the report of Assistant Adjutant General Foster, hereto annexed. The order of the President suspending further appointments, in the absence of any limitation of time in the act of Congress requiring them to be made, was the reason of the Secretary of War for not appointing commissioners in other slave States. The necessity of providing for the payment of troops, and the pressing exigencies of the war required all the funds furnished by the Treasury to be applied to those purposes, and for that reason payments on awards have been suspended."

After saying that the amount of the commutation fund in the Treasury on the date of the approval of this act by the President, to wit, the 24th of February, 1864, was $7,439,035 20, he proceeds as follows:

"The amount was subsequently increased by additional payments $10,438,529 25. Portions thereof were applied to the purposes set forth in the accompanying report of the Provost Marshal General, amounting to $3,302,641. The Provost Marshal General reports on hand, subject to the provisions of said act, the sum of $9,514,923 45, being now over two millions more than was on hand at the date of the appropriation, February 24, 1864."

So that, according to the showing of the Secretary, there are now in the Treasury liable to claims under this twenty-fourth section more than $9,500,000. But this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts does not ask for an appropriation of any more money than may be absolutely necessary for the payment of these claims. To the Maryland board, composed of gentlemen who examined into these claims with perhaps as keen a scrutiny and as much rigor as was possible under the circumstances, there were submitted claims to the number of three thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland whether there has been any report made by any commission.

Mr. CRESWELL. Yes, sir, there is a report made by the commissioners; the substance of it is given by the Secretary of War. I am now reading from the statement given to me by the commissioner-in-chief for the State of Maryland.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Has he made any report to the Secretary of War?

Mr. CRESWELL. He has made a report on the subject to the Secretary of War, and a synopsis of it was furnished to the Senate last February.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What does he say is the amount?

Mr. CRESWELL. I will read:

The commission for the State of Maryland was convened October 26, 1863, and dissolved October 18, 1865. There were filed with this commission three thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven claims for compensation under the act of Congress referred to. Awards were made by the commission upon seven hundred and eighty-six claims, the amount awarded being..... $230,750
Twenty-five of these claims have been paid, amounting in the aggregate to..... 6,900
Leaving an unpaid balance of..... $223,850

I was going on to show the estimate which is made by Mr. Timmons, who is the chief commissioner of that board. Mr. Timmons says that for the whole State of Maryland and the eastern shore of Virginia, which, owing to their geographical relations, were placed in the same division, there were filed up to October 18, 1865, 3,863 claims. "Of that number the board passed upon 1,065, leaving the number not finally acted upon 2,798. From investigations made by the board there would be rejected for disloyalty and other causes at least 1,000, leaving the number of loyal claims to be decided 1,798. Upon the 1,065 claims passed, the board awarded the sum of $222,450, or a fraction over $200 per slave."

The Senator from Maine will observe that there is a slight discrepancy between the statement made by Mr. Timmons and that from the War Department—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator what there is to prevent the claims of those parties that have been adjudicated upon from being paid. There is abundance of funds to pay them after the adjudication.

Mr. CRESWELL. I do not know except that there has been some mysterious delay for nearly the two and a half years this act has been in force. It has been asserted, incorrectly, as I think, that this money was now in the Treasury and that some legislation was required to get it out in addition to that contained in the twenty-fourth section of the act of 1864. I think it is a mere technicality.

Mr. Timmons makes an estimate that the amount necessary to pay, say eighteen hundred additional claims at $300 each, (he puts it at the maximum amount,) would make an addition of $540,000, so that the total amount required to satisfy all these claims in the State of Maryland and the eastern shore of Virginia would be $762,000. Certainly less than $1,000,000 would pay for every enlisted slave of loyal owners.

I have only to say in conclusion that so far as my ideas of right and wrong go, it is our duty to satisfy these claims just as much as it was to satisfy the slave-owners in the District of Columbia for their slaves, and especially when we consider the circumstances under which this provision was inserted in the act of 1864. It is known to every gentleman who had anything to do with the passage of the conscription act, as that act was called at that time, that we were then in a strait to raise troops. It was known that the act of 1863 had virtually failed. It was evaded to such an extent that the Government was not being with sufficient rapidity supplied with troops, either white or black; more stringent means were necessary; and when, on the 10th of February, 1864, the proposition came from Mr. STEVENS in the other House, which is embodied in the first section of this law for the enrollment of every colored man in the country, slave or free, and for the counting of every man of that description in the national forces, it was received with a murmur of dissent from the Opposition as being revolutionary in its character, and by many gentlemen on our side of the House it was conceived to be greatly in advance of any position that we had ever before that time taken upon that subject. It was subsequently amended upon the suggestion of my then colleague, Mr. Henry Winter Davis, by the insertion of this clause:

"The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress charged to award a just compensation to each loyal owner of any slave who may voluntarily enter the service of the United States, payable out of the commutation money."

And then, as the Senator from Massachusetts has already stated, the section was reviewed and perfected in the committee of conference until it assumed its present shape. The proposition then came from our side of the House. It was an effort, as I have already said, not only to raise soldiers when soldiers were needed for the service of the United States, but as we then frankly stated, to break down the institution of slavery. In both these objects it succeeded.

From my State alone eight thousand colored men marched out to fight for the Union; and the result showed that when you gave the musket to the slave and taught him how to use it, you gave him his freedom also.

Now, sir, in my judgment, if we fail in rendering to these claimants what was tendered them by our own proposition, it will be an act of bad faith to which I for one will not be a party.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have a short executive session for a few minutes. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SUMNER. A recess has been ordered, I believe.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business for a few moments.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate took a recess until seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

NEGRO MARRIAGES IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 615.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 615) legalizing marriages and for other purposes in the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that all colored persons in the District of Columbia, who, previous to their actual emancipation, had undertaken and agreed to occupy the relation to each other of husband and wife, and are cohabitating together as such or in any way recognizing the relation as still existing at the time of the passage of the act, whether the rites of marriage have been celebrated between them or not, shall be deemed husband and wife, and be entitled to all the rights and privileges, and subject to the duties and obligations of that relation in like manner as if they had been duly married according to law, and all their children shall be deemed legitimate, whether born before or after the passage of the act. When the parties have ceased to cohabit before the passage of the act in consequence of the death of the woman, or from any other cause, all the children of the woman recognized by the man to be his shall be deemed legitimate.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF CORRECTION.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to take up House bill No. 379.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 379) to establish in the District of Columbia a Reform School for boys, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on the District of Columbia proposed several amendments to the bill. The first was in section one, lines four, five, and six, to strike out the words "an institution for the instruction, employment, and reformation of juvenile offenders to be called the Reform School for Boys," and in lieu thereof to insert "a fit and convenient house of correction, suitably and efficiently ventilated, with convenient yards, workshops, and other suitable accommodations adjoining or appurtenant thereto, for the safe-keeping, correction, governing, and employing of offenders legally committed thereto by authority of the courts and magistrates of the District of Columbia;" so as to make the section read:

That there shall be established in the District of Columbia, on the tract of land known as the Government farm, a fit and convenient house of correction suitably and efficiently ventilated, with convenient yards, workshops, and other suitable accommodations adjoining or appurtenant thereto, for the safe-keeping, correction, governing, and employing of offenders legally committed thereto by authority of the courts and magistrates of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the building already erected on that land for the purpose of establishing a similar institution, together with all the other property there collected for the same purpose, shall be transferred to the trustees appointed according to the provisions of this act, at a cost not exceeding $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four to strike out the word "to," in lines three, six, and eight, respectively, and in lieu thereof to insert "they may;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said board of trustees to take charge of the general interests of the institution; they may appoint a superintendent, a steward, a teacher, or teachers, and such other officers as may be found necessary, and may be approved by the Secretary of the Interior; they may fix the salaries of said officers, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior; they may prepare such by-laws as may be necessary to regulate and direct the management of the institution, which, however, shall not be valid until approved by the Secretary of the Interior; and exercise a vigilant supervision over the institution, its officers, and its inmates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out "Reform School" wherever these words occur in the bill, and insert "House of Correction."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eight, lines six and seven, to strike out "a term of time not less than one year and not to exceed the period of his minority," and to insert "his sentence;" so as to read:

That when any boy under the age of fourteen years is found guilty in a court in the District of Columbia of any crime punishable by imprisonment other than imprisonment for life, he shall be committed to the said House of Correction, and there held in custody of the superintendent for the term of his sentence, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following proviso at the close of the eighth section of the bill:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to prevent the discharge from the Reform School, by the trustees, of any boy, as reformed, whenever in their judgment he ought to be so discharged.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the ninth section of the bill, in these words:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That any boy under the age of fifteen years, residing in the District of Columbia, who may be brought by his parents or guardian before the judge of the orphan's court, or either of the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and there shown to be habitually disorderly, and defiant of the control of his parents or guardians, or for any sufficient reasons greatly in need of a stronger and more wholesome restraint and discipline, shall by said judge be committed to the Reform School, there to remain for such a term of time as the trustees may deem best, not to exceed the period of his minority.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the fourteenth section, in these words:

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That every boy committed to the Reform School shall be retained, governed, instructed, and employed, under the direction of the trustees, until the expiration of the term for which he was committed to the school, unless sooner discharged by the trustees as reformed; and the discharge of a boy as reformed, or on his arriving at the age of twenty-one years, shall be a complete release from all penalties and disabilities created by the sentence.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section sixteen, lines twenty-three to twenty-eight, to strike out the words, "the Secretary of the Interior shall secure an assessment of taxes in such delinquent city or county sufficient to cover the amount required and the expenses of collecting the same, and appoint a collector, who shall collect the taxes assessed in such manner as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior," and in lieu thereof to insert, "the party so making default shall be liable to summary proceedings before the supreme court of the District of Columbia, at the instance of the United States attorney for said District, to enforce the same, with interest thereon after the date of default;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of securing a transfer of the building and other property to the trustees, preparing the premises and building for occupancy, and for the payment of other necessary expenses, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $12,000, to be paid only on the order of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That $6,000 of said appropriation is hereby declared to be the sum that shall be assessed and paid by the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the county of Washington; and it shall be the duty of the proper authorities of the city of Washington to raise, by tax or otherwise, and pay into the Treasury of the United States, at or before the time when the premises shall be ready for occupancy by the House of Correction, the sum of $4,500; and it shall be the duty of the proper authorities of the city of Georgetown to raise and pay in like manner the sum of $1,000; and it shall be the duty of the proper authorities of the county of Washington to raise and pay in like manner the sum of $650; and in case of default of such payment into the Treasury of the United States by either of said cities or by the said county of Washington, the party so making default shall be liable to summary proceedings before the supreme court of the District of Columbia, at the instance of the United States attorney for said District, to enforce the same, with interest thereon after the date of default.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 325) to give certain powers to the levy court of the country of Washington, in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 178) to incorporate the Metropolitan Mining and Manufacturing Company;

A bill (S. No. 277) for the relief of William Cook;

A bill (S. No. 246) relating to public schools in the District of Columbia; and

A bill (S. No. 137) to amend the acts approved August 6, 1861, and July 16, 1862, establishing a Metropolitan police in the District of Columbia and to increase the efficiency thereof, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 772) to authorize the issue of certain bonds in denominations greater than $1,000 was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 776) in relation to the unlawful tapping of Government water-pipes was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 83) declaring Tennessee again entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 191) relating to the building lately occupied for a national fair in aid of the orphans of the soldiers and sailors of the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CALIFORNIA AND OREGON RAILROAD.

The President pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 123) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific railroad, in California, to Portland, in Oregon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the amendment will be concurred in at once.

Mr. STEWART. I will say to the other members of the Committee on Public Lands that I have examined the amendment made by the House of Representatives, and although it comes in the shape of a substitute, it is substantially the same bill which we passed with some additional limitations, a more carefully guarded bill than the one we passed.

Mr. POMEROY. On the statement made I have no objection to the bill passing. I have not read it.

Mr. STEWART. I have; it is all right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The amendment is substantially the same bill as was passed by the Senate, with little or no difference except verbal changes.

The President pro tempore. No objection being made the Chair will regard the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate bill No. 123 as before the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment of the House of Representatives, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert a substitute; and having read the first two sections of the substitute—

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to dispense with the further reading of that amendment. The substantial parts have been read, and I know that the remainder of the bill is the same as was passed by the Senate. I have examined the amendment.

The President pro tempore. The reading can be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that is quite as well, for it is very clear that no person can understand the force of the House amendment by this mode of legislating. It is all right, I have no doubt; but of course no Senator knows anything about it.

Mr. STEWART. The House have taken our bill, put in a number of little amendments, and then offered the bill, as amended, as a substitute for our bill.

The President pro tempore. Is there any objection to suspending the reading of the House amendment?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not object, for the reading is entirely useless.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that from this point forward it is exactly the same bill which was passed by the Senate. I have examined it. We have already passed it once.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. How many sections per mile are given to the road?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ten.

Mr. POMEROY. Ten alternate sections on each side, making twenty sections per mile.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And no money?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No money. There is really no land to be granted, and that grant is a mere formal matter, the land being pretty much all taken up.

The amendment was concurred in.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' UNION.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 587.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 587) to incorporate the Soldiers' and Sailors' Union of Washington, District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to incorporate H. A. Hall, W. C. Porter, Will A. Short, James Cross, J. H. Nightingale, D. S. Curtiss, L. Edwin Dudley, G. M. Van Buren, William S. Morse, Lawrence Wilson, William L. Bramhall, F. E. Drake, B. P. Cutter, W. H. H. Bates, H. N. Rothery, S. G. Merrill, Charles A. Appel, O. A. Lukenbaugh, J. S. Firman, John H. Simpson, George W. De Costa, L. J. Bryant, J. H. Gray, Lyman S. Emery, and A. I. Bennett, as a body politic and corporate, by the name of the "Soldiers' and Sailors' Union of the city of Washington, District of Columbia."

The corporation may acquire, receive, hold, and convey real and personal estate; which estate shall never be divided among the members, but shall descend to their successors for the promotion of the interests and general welfare of the soldiers and sailors of this corporation who have served in the Union Army or Navy during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, and the relief and protection of their widows and orphans.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to inquire whether this bill has been before one of the committees.

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir. It is reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS. It seems to me this bill authorizes this association to acquire an indefinite quantity of real estate and to hold it to them and their successors. It seems to me rather an extraordinary provision. I should like to have the bill referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. If it is all right, I do not want to oppose any obstruction to its passage; but I think it ought to be examined by that committee, and I make the motion that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORRILL. I should hardly think that the Senate would consider the reasons assigned by the honorable Senator from Kentucky sufficient to authorize the reference of such a bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. I understand the Senator to say that it authorizes the holding of an unlimited amount of estate. That is no legal or constitutional objection which should lead to its reference to the Judiciary Committee. If the honorable Senator thinks there is any danger, it is very easy to move an amendment to guard against that.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the honorable Senator if my exception to the purport of the bill is true.

Mr. MORRILL. I think they have a right to acquire and hold as much real and personal estate as is necessary for the object of the association.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the object of the corporation?

Mr. MORRILL. The bill is to incorporate the Soldiers' and Sailors' Union of the District of Columbia. The bill comes from the House of Representatives, and if it is sent back, I do not know that it will get through, but I have no objection to limiting the amount of property to be held to $200,000, and I therefore move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "estate," in line three of section two, the words "not exceeding $200,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary withdrawn?

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to add to the amendment just adopted the words "in value" after the word "dollars." I do not know what "property not exceeding $200,000" would mean. I move, therefore, to add the words "in value."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHAN HOME.

On motion by Mr. MORRILL the bill (H. R. No. 779) to incorporate "The National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home," was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The corporators are Mrs. Julia B. Grant, Mrs. Ellen E. Sherman, Mrs. H. D. Cooke, Mrs. Margaret Fahnestock, Mrs. Kathleen Carlisle, Miss Charlotte Taylor, Mrs. Jane Speed, Mrs. Mary J. Wells, Mrs. A. C. Harlan, Mrs. Jane L. Smith, Mrs. Mary K. Lewis, Mrs. Jane Farnham, Mrs. Eliza M. Morris, Mrs. Cecilia S. Sherman, Mrs. Ellen Boyer, Mrs. Elizabeth A. Howard, Mrs. Kate C. Sprague, Mrs. Eliza B. Nye, Mrs. Annie Rouse, Mrs. Kate L. Plants, Mrs. Elizabeth G. Todd, Mrs. Abby E. Hale, Mrs. J. M. Trumbull, Miss Sarah Wood, Mrs. Jane Annie Pirtle, Miss Elizabeth Howard, and their successors.

The Committee on the District of Columbia proposed to amend the bill by striking out of section six the following words:

All Senators and members of the House of Representatives shall be ex officio members of any advisory committee to be provided for by the constitution or by laws of said corporation; and that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

NEW DISTRICT JAIL.

Mr. MORRILL. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 124) authorizing the construction of a jail in and for the District of Columbia, to report it without amendment and recommend its passage, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to select a suitable place on some of the public grounds belonging to the Government in the city of Washington, and to construct thereon, upon such plan as he may select, a jail of sufficient capacity to provide for not less than three hundred prisoners, with suitable yards, hospitals, &c., the entire cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $200,000. The Secretary of the Interior is to employ an architect and have prepared a design for the building, and plans descriptive thereof, with complete specifications of the work required and the materials to be used, and to publish notice of a public letting of the contract for the building of the jail, at least thirty days before the letting, in the principal newspapers in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Baltimore, and Washington, which notice shall direct a place where such specifications can be seen, and a time at which the contract is to be let; and the Secretary is to let the contract to the lowest responsible bidder, and the contractor is to enter into sufficient bond for the faithful completion of the contract to the approval of the Secretary.

The Secretary of the Interior is to sell at public sale, on proper notice, the materials of the old jail, now located in Judiciary square, and the proceeds are to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

For the purpose of reimbursing the United States for a part of the cost the proper authorities of the city of Washington are required to raise, by tax or otherwise, and pay into the Treasury of the United States, at or before the time of the completion of the jail, the sum of $70,000; the proper authorities of the city of Georgetown, $20,000, and the proper authorities of the county of Washington, $10,000, which sums shall be deemed the fair proportion of the cost of the jail of each of the cities and to the county of Washington; these authorities, respectively, are required to assess and levy upon the taxable property of the cities and of the county of Washington a tax sufficient to raise the amount so by each city and said county required to be paid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON LAND AND BUILDING COMPANY.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 384, to incorporate the Washington Land and Building Company of the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was in section two, line three, after the word "dollars," to insert "nor be less than $100,000;" so that the clause will read:

That the capital stock of this corporation shall not exceed $500,000, nor be less than $100,000, and that a share in the same shall be fifty dollars, and books of subscription to the capital stock.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line five, after the word "stock," to strike out "or to such portions thereof as from time to time may be by the directors, for the time being, be deemed proper and necessary."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line eight, to strike out "directors," and insert "corporators;" and in line twelve, after "valuation," to insert "to be determined by said directors."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eight, line five, after "act," to strike out "and that it shall be lawful for Congress, at any time hereafter, to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Why are those words stricken out?

Mr. WADE. They were in twice over.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that a corporation ought not to be created for the purpose mentioned in this bill. I do not think we need corporations in this country to become the owners of real estate with a view to leasing it out and selling it. That is the entire purpose of this bill. I know many of the proposed corporators, and they are excellent gentlemen, some of them my personal friends, but I shall not vote for such a bill as this. I ask, before I proceed, that the Secretary read that section which defines the powers of the corporation; I think it is the seventh section.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall have full power and authority, on behalf of the company, to purchase or lease land within the city of Washington, and sub-lease or sell and convey the same, to erect dwelling-houses and all other buildings on the land so leased or purchased, and rent, lease, or sell the same, with the land appurtenances thereunto belonging, and generally to do and perform all acts, matters, and things to encourage mechanics and citizens of Washington in procuring houses and homes upon the most advantageous and economical terms.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That stump-speech part I understand very well. The power that is conferred is the power of a corporation to become the owner of the real estate of Washington, for the simple purpose of speculating in real estate or building houses upon it, or leasing and selling. I say that this is a power which a corporation ought not to be able to exercise. When we create ordinary corporations we say that they shall own real estate to the extent required for the business of the corporation. We consider it so great an evil to allow property to be held in dead hands that we prohibit it to other corporations except to the extent required. But here is a corporation out and out to speculate in land. I know it is said to encourage mechanics. God save the mechanics when they have to depend upon corporations for their prosperity! Their interest is to have the real estate of the country free, everybody to buy and everybody to improve according to his means. These are clever gentlemen; but when they commence building houses to give away to mechanics, I shall be surprised.

Mr. WADE. It seems to me there is great caution about these corporations. So far from there being anything objectionable in this seventh section defining the powers of this incorporation, in my judgment it is the great merit. I am glad that mechanics will band together for the purpose of purchasing lands and putting buildings upon it and leasing or selling those buildings. If there is an overgrown landlord here, a man of great wealth, he may go on and he may employ all the mechanics in the world, and gentlemen have no kind of difficulty with him. He may go on and he may buy all the land around him, he may erect buildings upon it, and he may sell them or rent them to his heart's content, and may speculate in them; but if a few mechanics of any means get together for the purpose of doing that same thing, then arises this terrible objection. Do you want to grind them down under foot? Because they have not the means, each individual on his own behalf, to do this same thing, you intend that it never shall be done! What more objectionable is there because a few mechanics in moderate circumstances club together and are incorporated for the purpose of doing this same lawful thing than that one man should do it, he having wealth enough to do it all himself? Do you want to compel the poor mechanics to work under this great landlord? That is the idea, that they shall not do anything on their own hook, and you will give them no advantages for doing anything! You are exceedingly frightened at the idea that these poor men who are skilled to labor may speculate! You think it is dangerous to give them a chance to work for themselves and purchase land for the purpose of erecting buildings upon it and to lease those buildings or sell them afterward! I say so far, in my judgment, from this being any objection to this bill, it is highly meritorious, and there is no possible objection to it; no evil can arise from it; it will be for the benefit of the incorporators, and it will be equally beneficial to those who wish to rent or occupy buildings in this town. I do not think there is any objection whatever to that section or any other part of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Permit me to ask if the capital of the company is limited.

Mr. WADE. The capital is limited; it is not to be above $500,000 nor under $100,000.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to inquire whether there is personal liability of the stockholders?

Mr. WADE. I do not think there is anything said about their liability.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I consider all that the Senator from Ohio has said about the benefit of the mechanics and of the grinding of them down as humbug, with great respect to the Senator. There never was a corporation yet created for the benefit of the mechanics, nor for the benefit of the laboring classes. That is not the thing that is done. He says we allow individuals of wealth to buy lands and build houses. We cannot help that a man accumulates property; and does the Senator consider it an evil that the land of the country shall fall into the hands of the few? Does the Senator consider it an evil that a few should become the owners of real estate because they are wealthy? Then, shall we increase that evil by increasing corporations with a capital of half a million dollars, that they, too, may become the owners of real estate, that it may fall into the hands of a corporation for the profit of the stockholders?

The Senator talks about these mechanics that are in this bill, these corporators. Does the Senator know these corporators? Is not the Senator acquainted with John M. Brodhead? Is he a mechanic, the Second Comptroller of the Treasury? Is Moses Kelly a mechanic—a man that used to be in the Interior Department, I believe the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, now cashier of one of the banks of this city, the National Metropolitan bank—is he the mechanic that the gentleman speaks about? Is Mr. Joseph F. Brown, the richest man in this city, perhaps, the owner of nearly all the gas company stock, or very much of it, a man of very large wealth—is he the mechanic that the Senator talks about? Is Mr. B. B. French, the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Public Grounds, the mechanic that the Senator is talking about?

I will ask him now, who is the practical mechanic in this list of corporators that he talks about anybody wanting to grind down? I do not want these men of wealth to become a corporation for the purpose of buying up on speculation the lands of the country anywhere. My judgment is that land ought to be free to any man that can buy it and wants to go on it. It is an unheard-of proposition in this country. It took the legislation of one hundred years in England to relieve the real estate of that country to a little extent from being held in dead hands, in mortmain. Now, we are going to commence it here by incorporating a company to own and speculate in, lease and sell real estate; and these are the mechanics that the Senator talks about.

If it is the pleasure of Congress to start out on this course, I have no special objection, but I felt it to be my duty to call the attention of Senators to the character of the bill. If this was an incorporated company for the purpose of building a large manufacturing establishment, we would in express terms say that that corporation should not become the owner of any more real estate than was necessary for the purpose of the incorporation; that is, for the purpose of putting up and carrying on their manufacturing business, because we are not content that the lands shall fall into the hands of the speculators of incorporated companies. It is against the whole policy of the country. I believe it is against the policy of every State, and therefore I object to it in this District.

Mr. WADE. It seems that some of these corporators are wealthy men, bankers, and the like. Now, I should be very glad to divert some capital from banking purposes to building improvements. This corporation is limited to a capital not exceeding half a million dollars and not less than one hundred thousand dollars. Overgrown wealthy men of course can go into this business on their own hook to any extent. This is not like a manufacturing company, where the corporation is confined to the real estate necessary to do that particular business upon. It is a corporation for the purpose of building houses in this town, to acquire land for that purpose, and to own it. Very unnecessarily, to be sure, the bill goes on to say that they may lease and let or sell their own land and buildings. Of course they could do that, whether the bill said anything about it or not.

I cannot see any kind of objection to the bill. It is to promote a very laudable business, and the individual corporators are made liable to the extent of the amount of their stock—the usual liability. Then it is provided that the act of incorporation is subject to be modified, repealed, or amended by Congress at any time. There is nothing in the bill that is objectionable, in my judgment. However, I leave it to the Senate. I do not wish to take up time with it.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not think there is anything in this bill that we need be alarmed about. It is intended to correct an evil that has existed in Washington perhaps always, certainly a long time before I came here. There seems to be nobody in this town engaged particularly in the business of building houses to rent. The object of these corporators, as I understand, is to build houses that are comfortable for persons of moderate means, and they propose then to sell them, and the rents which the occupants pay monthly are to go toward the purchase. The amount of money paid from month to month as rent is to go to the purchase of the building, so that the clerks and mechanics in this town may ultimately get title to the building, when, without an association of this kind, they might pay rent eternally and never get a title. The object is to take the amount of rent paid, and apply it to the purchase money. This is the project these persons have in view. I think it is a very good one. I only fear that it will not succeed, but if it succeeds it will be a great benefit to those of moderate means. I have been paying rent here for three or four years past of a most extraordinary and exorbitant character. I do not see how persons who are living on a salary of two or three thousand dollars a year are able to rent comfortable houses in this city.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to ask the Senator from Kansas where he gets his information. It is not in the bill, and I understand there is no report accompanying the bill showing that these are the benevolent purposes of this corporation. If it becomes a purely benevolent institution, it will be the first corporation I ever heard of which was of that character.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not put it on the ground of a purely benevolent institution. I said they proposed to take the rents collected from month to month and apply them toward the discharge of the purchase money of the house rented, and whenever the clerk or mechanic, or whoever occupies the house, has paid enough rent to purchase it he owns it. There is no such system as that now in existence here, and I think it is a great improvement.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Put in the bill that they shall do that.

Mr. POMEROY. It is not in the bill, but I learn this from those who have called on me to explain the object, and they are gentlemen of integrity and character, as the Senator himself knows.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I admit that.

Mr. POMEROY. They do not propose to swindle anybody. I suppose, of course, they intend to make something, but only a reasonable profit, such as men are entitled to who engage in any kind of business. If by this system they will be able to furnish homes to men who can only pay installments month by month it will be a great thing. I have lived in communities where men pay rent month after month for a life-time and never own anything, whereas if that rent paid from month to month could have been applied to the purchase of the building they would have finally found themselves owners of real estate, and had that comfort in their declining years. That is the object of this corporation.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As this is the commencement of a system, the first bill of the kind proposing to create a corporation to speculate in lands, I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall vote for this bill, first, because the object is a laudable one, and will be very beneficial if carried out according to the spirit of the bill. I do not think there is any danger to be apprehended, first, because the charter may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is taken out.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no; it is in.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I heard an amendment read striking out that provision.

Mr. JOHNSON. One provision of that sort was stricken out because it was in the bill twice. In the second place, by the second section the stockholders are made responsible for the debts contracted by the company to the extent of the value of the stock held by it at the time.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Creswell, Fessenden, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomero, Ramsey, Riddle, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Hendricks, Lane, Norton, and Stewart—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cragin, Dixon, Edmunds, Grimes, Guthrie, Howard, Kirkwood, Nesmith, Poland, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Wright, and Yates—17.

So the bill was passed.

METROPOLITAN CLUB.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 393.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 393) to incorporate the Metropolitan Club of the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GENERAL HOSPITAL OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WADE. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 214) to incorporate the General Hospital of the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to make, declare, and constitute Joseph Henry, James C. Hall, Amos Kendall, Thomas Miller, Richard Wallach, George W. Riggs, Grafton Tyler, Henry D. Cooke, D. W. Middleton, Charles Knap, Benjamin B. French, James C. McGuire, Charles H. Nichols, William B. Todd, William Gunton, Edward Simms, and Thomas Young, and their successors in office, a corporation and body-politic, in law and in fact, under the name and style of the directors of the General Hospital of the District of Columbia. The annual income of property held by the corporation is not to exceed in value the sum of $25,000. The corporation is to have power to open and keep a hospital in the city of Washington for the care of such sick, wounded, and invalid persons as may place themselves under its care.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PROBATE AND RECORDING OF WILLS.

Mr. WADE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 289.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 289) to provide for the probate of, and for the recording of wills of real estate situated in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was in section two, line six, after the word "receive" to insert "in addition to;" after "compensation" to insert "now;" and in line seven after "law" to insert "a fee of one dollar for drawing up and recording the order of court admitting to probate and record each will, testament, or codicil;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all wills, testaments, and codicils, admitting to probate in the District of Columbia shall be forthwith recorded by the register of wills in said District in a suitable bound book, regularly indexed, to be kept for that purpose in his office, and for which the said register shall receive in addition to the compensation now provided by law, a fee of one dollar for drawing up and recording the order of court admitting to probate and record each will, testament, or codicil.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of section three, "and for each authentication under seal of the court he shall receive a fee of fifty cents."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eight, line five, after the word "provide," to strike out "and suitably furnish."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the same section, line nine, after the word "county," to insert "and also to fit up and furnish said rooms, under the direction of the register of wills, with everything that may at any time be required for the safe, convenient, and comfortable transaction of the business appertaining thereto."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I had supposed that the orphan's court now could take the probate of a will of real as well as personal estate. The act of Maryland has been so construed as to give to our orphan's courts the authority to take probate, whether the will related to real or personal estate. But I have not so much objection to that, because there may be some doubt about it, and I suppose there is or the bill would not have been proposed; but I suggest to my friend from Ohio that perhaps he will find it necessary to amend the fourth section of this bill. A copy of the will or codicil admitted to probate is to be received in evidence; but in a variety of cases in relation to wills the authenticity of the paper itself is disputed, whether the alleged testator actually signed it, and the most material evidence in relation to a question of that sort is the paper itself. Now, the fourth section says that "every will, testament, or codicil which shall have been admitted to probate shall be held, retained, and preserved in the office of the register of wills of said District, and shall not be delivered out of said office to any person or persons whatsoever." I am rather apprehensive that that would place it out of the power of the court to compel the production of the original paper.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the section by adding "except by order of the court."

Mr. JOHNSON. "Before whom the question of the authenticity of the will may be depending."

Mr. WADE. Very well. They may want it to authenticate the original will.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Ohio repeat his amendment?

Mr. WADE. I move to add to the fourth section the words "except by order of the court." I think that will be sufficient.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time and passed.

COUNTY HORSE RAILROAD.

Mr. WADE. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 390.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 390) to incorporate the Washington County Horse Railroad Company, in the District of Columbia. Samuel P. Brown, Francis Mattingly, Noble D. Larner, Marshall Brown, Joseph L. Pearson, and their associates and assigns, are by the title of the bill created a body-corporate under the name of the "Washington County Horse Railroad Company," with authority to construct and lay down a double or single track railway, with the necessary switches and turnouts, in the county of Washington, commencing at Boundary street, at its intersection with Fourteenth street, and along the Fourteenth street road in a northerly direction to a point where that road intersects a new road recently opened by the levy court, and along the new road in an easterly direction, to the Seventh street turnpike, and along the turnpike in a southerly direction to Boundary street, (but that the consent of the board of directors of the Seventh Street Turnpike Company is to be first obtained for the use of their road,) with the right to run public carriages thereon, and receiving therefor a rate of fare not exceeding ten cents a passenger for any distance on said road.

The Committee on the District of Columbia reported an amendment, which was to strike out section eighteen, as follows:

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall have authority to extend the railway herein provided for, and to construct and operate such other passenger railways in the county of Washington, outside the corporate limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, as the levy court may consent to, and the rights and privileges herein granted are extended to such other passenger railways as may be constructed under this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

Mr. WILLEY. I move to take up for consideration House bill No. 559.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 559) to authorize the extension, construction, and use by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company of a railroad from between Knoxville and the Monocacy Junction into and within the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is recited that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, incorporated by the State of Maryland, are desirous of extending the road authorized to be built by them by an act of the General Assembly of that State entitled "An act to authorize the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to build a railroad from a point on the line of its road between Knoxville and the Monocacy Junction, through Frederick and Montgomery counties, to the boundary of the District of Columbia, so as to make a direct communication with the city of Washington," into and within the District of Columbia; and it is proposed to authorize the company to extend that road into and within the District of Columbia, to such point or points, terminus or termini, as may be agreed upon between the company and the corporation of Washington, in respect of a road within the limits of Washington, and between the company and the corporation of Georgetown, as respects a road within the limits of Georgetown. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company are authorized to have and exercise the same powers, rights, and privileges, and to be subject to the same restrictions, in the extension and construction of the road, into and within the District as they have, may exercise, or possess, or are subject to within the State of Maryland, under and by virtue of their charter or act of incorporation from the State of Maryland; and all the provisions of the several acts of Congress relating to the lateral road authorized to be built into and within the District of Columbia by an act passed March 2, 1831, and entitled "An act to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Ohio road into and within the District of Columbia," and the supplements thereto, be, and they are, declared to apply to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company so far as they are severally applicable to the location, construction, and use by the company of the road now authorized to be constructed into and within the District.

The railroad company are to commence the construction of this extension of the road within one year, and complete it within three years after the passage of the act; and on failure to do so the privileges granted are to be forfeited.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise for the purpose of asking my friend from West Virginia the meaning of the latter part of the second section in one particular. The section says that the several provisions in the act of Congress relating to the lateral road authorized to be built by the Baltimore and Ohio railroad by an act approved March 2, 1831, giving the title of the act, shall be declared to apply to the Baltimore and Ohio railroad so far as they are severally applicable to the location and construction "by said company of the road now authorized." My question is, whether that is intended to mean the road to be made by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company under this act? I suppose it is, but I am not so sure about it.

Mr. WILLEY. I so understand it. The bill comes from the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection, then, but I think it is not very clearly drawn in that respect.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

CHURCH PROPERTY.

Mr. WILLEY. I move to take up for consideration House bill No. 564.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 564) to annul the thirty-fourth section of the declaration of rights of the State of Maryland so far as it applies to the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS. What is that article of the declaration of rights which is to be annulled?

Mr. WILLEY. I have it here.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator will read it.

Mr. WILLEY. It is in these words:

"34. That every gift, sale, or devise of lands to any minister, public teacher, or preacher of the gospel, as such, or to any religious sect, order, or denomination, or to or for the support, use, or benefit of, or in trust for any minister, public teacher, or preacher of the gospel, as such, or any religious sect, order, or denomination; and every gift or sale of goods or chattels, to go in succession, or to take place after the death of the seller or owner, or to or for such support, use, or benefit; and also every devise of goods or chattels to or for the support, use, or benefit of any minister, public teacher, or preacher of the gospel, as such, or any religious sect, order, or denomination, without the leave of the Legislature, shall be void; except always any sale, gift, lease, or devise of any quantity of land not exceeding two acres, for a church, meeting, or other house of worship, and for a burying-ground, which shall be improved, enjoyed, or used only for such purpose, or such sale, gift, lease, or devise shall be void."

The act of 1801, "concerning the District of Columbia," contains this clause: "That the laws of the State of Maryland, as they now exist, shall be and continue in force in that part of the said District which was ceded by that State to the United States." When this bill was originally introduced, in a conference with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] he suggested that perhaps there ought to be some limitation upon gifts and devises for religious uses. It was concluded between us that it would be better for him to introduce an independent bill defining exactly what the extent of these gifts and devises should be. The special object of this bill is to allow an old gentleman in his declining years to make a donation of some ten or twelve thousand dollars for the purpose of building a Presbyterian church, and under the law as it now stands he cannot do it. In the meantime the Senator from Maryland proposes to introduce a bill which shall provide all necessary guarantees better than can be done by any amendment of this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to inquire when the contemplated bill restricting the amount of such devises will be introduced. I suppose it ought to be contemporaneous with the repeal of this clause in the bill of rights of the constitution of Maryland in its application here. I think that it is the policy of our country in all the States to restrict the amount of this class of devises that are interdicted by this clause of the bill of rights of the State of Maryland. I think there ought to be no interregnum in the law or regulation which restricts the amount; no unreasonable interregnum at any rate. I should think it might be attended to at this session.

Mr. WILLEY. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky can at any time—and he is most competent to do so—introduce a bill on the subject. I understood from the Senator from Maryland that he would avail himself of his leisure and convenience to introduce a bill to that effect. The passage of this bill at this time can have no evil effect, because no danger can accrue before a bill of the character suggested by the Senator from Kentucky can be introduced and passed. For myself I see no necessity for such a bill in this country under our existing laws.

Mr. DAVIS. It is not my duty to introduce any such bill as that. It appertains to the honorable Senator himself as a member of the committee that reported the bill to abrogate this section of the bill of rights of the constitution of Maryland. I do not agree with the honorable Senator in the opinion he has expressed that there is no need of such an interdiction upon the amount of devises to religious associations in this country. We know the extent to which such devises reached in past centuries in England, and there is a very considerable tendency in this country to the aggregation of large amounts of real estate in incorporated religious bodies and churches. It certainly is a feature in the policy of the United States in all the States to interdict, or at least to impose, restrictions upon the value and extent of such devises. I hold myself that there is no policy more obviously right, and I have no doubt that a perfect license to make such devises would, in the course of a generation or two, produce evils of the greatest magnitude and mischief within our country.

Now, what does this bill propose? Here is an interdiction by the fundamental law of the State of Maryland upon such devises, wholly, I believe. I would not myself be in favor of the entire interdiction of such devises, but would want them restricted to a reasonable amount in value and quantity. It certainly is fit and proper, and not only that, but the duty of the committee, that it introduces a bill for the purpose of abrogating the total restriction, to continue it at least to a reasonable and politic extent.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should think it, sir, very extraordinary if such a prohibition has continued in the constitution of the State of Maryland. I think it would be rather remarkable that it had not undergone some modification since 1776.

Mr. WILLEY. I will explain to the Senator that I do not know whether this provision is in the constitution of Maryland now, but it was in the constitution of Maryland in 1801, at the time the cession was made, and being by the terms of the act of Congress of that year made a part of the laws of this District, it has never been repealed by Congress since that time.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think it is very clear that that prohibition existing in this District is too extensive in its operation. I do not understand that there is any limit to the prohibition except the dispensing power given to the Legislature, which I understand is to be exercised in particular cases brought before it upon petition or other application. Now, that is so inconvenient, sometimes quite impossible, that the restriction may be accepted as universal for all practical purposes. I dare say that there never has been an application, or if there has been an application it has not been often repeated, in the history of Maryland for a dispensation from the operation of this clause of the constitution.

While, therefore, it appears to me that it would be unreasonable to change the law of this District, if it be as stated, I am convinced that it is equally clear that there should be some prohibition, and that no portion of time should be permitted to elapse without some limitation upon this power of death-bed bequests. I know that in our State we have a general statute, and one that is warmly approved by public opinion. It underwent consideration in the Legislature within the last ten or twelve years. It is a carefully drawn statute prepared by a distinguished lawyer of Philadelphia, supplying the place of former statutes in our State on that subject. It prohibits donations or devises made within one calendar month of the death of the person making the devise or bequest. It may be that that is not the most appropriate form in which such a limitation should be placed. I mention it only as an illustration of the universality of legislation of this kind throughout the American Union. I dare say that there is such a provision in the laws of almost every State of the Union; and we obtain it from England, where the experience of centuries has proved its necessity.

Now, sir, if the Senator from West Virginia desires to pass a bill removing the inhibition of the existing law in the case of citizens of this District, he can easily change his bill and make it conform to that intention or design, and it will pass without a word of objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. That would necessitate sending it back to the House.

Mr. BUCKALEW. If it be amended in the Senate it can readily be acted on in the House. Amendments of one House to the bills of the other are always in order. I am quite unwilling to remove all restriction upon the power of making bequests of this description. I think that the wisdom of centuries and the judgment and action of legislative bodies in the Old World and the New ought to be considered as having settled this question, and settled it conclusively. Persons in the last hours of an expiring existence are subjected to influences of a very unusual character, and are subjected to them at a time when they are little able to exercise the full and mature powers of their minds. I am unwilling to vote for the bill as it stands.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no amendment be proposed, the question is on ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. DAVIS. Upon that question, or on the passage of the bill I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLEY. I move that the bill be laid on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

EAST CAPITOL STREET.

Mr. WILLEY. I move to take up for consideration House bill No. 601.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 601) to grade East Capitol street and establish Lincoln square.

It proposes to direct the Commissioner of Public Buildings, in such manner as he may deem most proper, to cause East Capitol street to be graded from Third street east to Eleventh street east, and to cause the square at its intersection with Massachusetts, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Kentucky avenues, between Eleventh and Thirteenth streets east, to be inclosed with a wooden fence, and it is to be known as Lincoln square. Fifteen thousand dollars is appropriated to enable the improvement to be made.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

Mr. WILLEY. I move to take up Senate bill No. 424.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 424) to incorporate the Washington Temperance Society of the city of Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLEY. I move to amend in section five, line one, by striking out after the word "act" the words "shall inure for thirty years, unless sooner repealed by Congress," and inserting "may be altered or repealed at the pleasure of Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I should like to hear the first section of the bill read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That John S. Hollingshead, William G. Flood, Christopher Cammack, sr., Asbury Lloyd, John B. Wheeler, Z. B. Brooke, R. A. Fish, George W. Maher, W. P. Drew, William H. Nally, Thomas B. Marche, Oscar Alexander, William Dixon, and others who now are or may hereafter become members of said society, and their successors, are hereby declared to be one community and body-corporate by the name, style, and title of the Washington Temperance Society of Washington city and District of Columbia; and by that name they shall be, and are hereby, made able and capable in law to have, receive, and retain to them and their successors property, real and personal, also devises and bequests of any person or persons, bodies corporate or politic, capable of making the same, and the same to dispose of or transfer at their pleasure in such manner as they may think proper: Provided always, That the said corporation shall not at any time hold or possess property, real, personal, or mixed, exceeding in value the sum of $25,000 other than that which may be invested in a hall to be erected for the purposes of the society.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, I am altogether satisfied with the propriety of the passage of this bill. There are two or three persons named there who if they can be incorporated into a sound temperance society it will do them infinite good, [laughter,] and that that may happen I will support the proposition. It has been said, "The greater the sinner the greater the saint."

The bill was passed.

CHURCH PROPERTY.

Mr. WILLEY. I move to take from the table the bill just laid upon it—House bill No. 564.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 564) to annul the thirty-fourth section of the declaration of rights of the State of Maryland so far as it applies to the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON. I very readily recognize the force of the observations made by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW.] It is very desirable that devises and gifts to objects of that description should be executed some reasonable time antecedent to the death of the donor or testator. I believe the same provision of which he spoke as existing in Pennsylvania will be found in the laws of other States. I move, therefore, as an amendment to come in at the close of the bill this proviso:

Provided, That in case of gifts and devises, the same shall be made within one calendar month before the death of the donor or testator.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think that limitation will correct the evil. In my State there is a limit upon the amount and value of bequests and devises to religious societies, especially of real estate. This proviso will effect very little toward the correction of the evil, if evil it be. In the neighboring country of Mexico it is said that half the lands of the country are held by the church. When Henry VIII ascended the throne of England there was a large proportion of the lands of the kingdom held in perpetuity by religious associations. I do not know how it is in the other States, but in my State there is a jealousy of that principle, and we have legal if not constitutional provisions regulating and restricting the amount that any religious association or organization of any kind shall hold. I take it there ought to be a restriction of the same character in relation to this District if the section of the bill of rights of the constitution of Maryland upon that point is to be repealed. I move that the bill lie upon the table.

Mr. JOHNSON. The immediate occasion as I understand for the introduction of the bill is that there is a gentleman here, a very excellent man in all particulars, who desires to give a church some ten or twenty thousand dollars, but he is unable to do it because the original constitutional restriction which existed in Maryland forms a part of the law of the District, and that, as the Senate have seen, prohibits a church from receiving more than two acres of land except with the consent of the Legislature. I do not know that in any case where the Legislature of Maryland has been applied to by any religious congregation she has refused to let it go beyond the limit.

The constitution of Maryland which contains that provision was adopted in 1786. The constitution in this respect was modeled very much after the Government of England. It has been almost entirely done away with, so far as the original provisions are concerned, and I am by no means sure that this particular provision is now in force. I do not think, in the present condition of the country, that there is any danger from permitting parties to give to religious corporations what they may think proper. It is impossible with our institutions we can be in any danger from religious establishments: first, because there is no State religion; secondly, because there are so many different sects, each one of whom watches the others just as vigilantly as England would watch the dispositions of France. I do not see, therefore, that there is any great danger to result from leaving parties here to leave as much property to charities as they please.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator has not conceived the point of my objection. It is not from any apprehension of the establishment of a State religion, but it is to prevent too large an aggregation of property in religious societies. That is the reason, as I understand it, of the restriction in my own State. But sooner than be pertinacious about this matter, I am disposed to yield and let this fragment of a Senate do what it pleases in connection with this matter. However, I will make this remark: I believe that the rules of the Senate ought imperatively to require the Presiding Officer of the Senate to verify the presence of a quorum of the Senate whenever any bill of any character is passed. This thing of carelessly passing important bills when there are but a few members present, a number decidedly less than a constitutional quorum to do business, in my judgment ought to be reformed by a change in the rule of the Senate. That is the rule formally now, but it is not enforced. It is an ungracious business for a member of the Senate to object to the passage of a bill because there is not a quorum present. I think it ought to be ex officio the duty of the Presiding Officer to see that the principle of the Constitution, which is certainly an important one, is executed in every case in respect to having a quorum of the Senate present whenever a bill is passed.

With these remarks I will say nothing more in relation to this subject, but leave it to the Senate, or to the gentlemen who are present, who are not a Senate, to take what course they please in relation to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) Does the Senator from Kentucky withdraw his motion to lay the bill upon the table?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question, then, is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

ALEXANDRIA AND WASHINGTON RAILROAD.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 230) to amend an act to extend the charter of the Alexandria and Washington railroad, passed March 8, 1863, to report it back with amendments, and I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was to strike out all of section one after the word "authorized," in line six, and also all of section two down to and including the word "authorized," in line two, in the following words:

To extend said railroad from the track as now laid, or as the same may hereafter be laid, through Maryland avenue at the intersection of Sixth street west, through and along said Sixth street west in a northerly direction to a point at or near its intersection with Pennsylvania avenue which may be suitable for the location and construction of a depot for the receipt and discharge of passengers and freight.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That said railroad company be, and the same is hereby, authorized.

So that the first section will read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Washington, Alexandria, and Georgetown Railroad Company, a corporation lawfully succeeding to the charter, rights, and privileges of the Alexandria and Washington Railroad Company, be, and the same is hereby, authorized to extend said railroad from the track, as the same is now or may hereafter be laid, through Maryland avenue at its intersection with Virginia avenue, through and along said Virginia avenue in an easterly direction to its intersection with D street south; thence along D street and across the Washington canal to New Jersey avenue; thence by a curve to the left of not less than one thousand feet radius, to a point in square number seven hundred and thirty-two; thence by an underground excavation or tunnel, passing under squares number seven hundred and thirty-two, seven hundred and sixty-two, seven hundred and sixty-one, seven hundred and sixty, seven hundred and eighty-seven, seven hundred and eighty-six, eight hundred and sixteen, eight hundred and fifteen, eight hundred and thirty-nine, eight hundred and thirty-eight, eight hundred and sixty-six, eight hundred and sixty-five, eight hundred and sixty-four, and the different streets and avenues intervening, to a point in square number eight hundred and ninety-three; thence, by a curve of not less than one thousand feet radius, into Eighth street east; thence by the most direct and eligible route to an intersection with the Washington branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the effect of the amendment?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state what the effects of it is. The House bill authorizes the Alexandria and Washington Railroad Company to cross the canal on Sixth street and build a depot, provided they can purchase the property north of the canal and immediately south of Pennsylvania avenue. The Committee on the District of Columbia in the Senate are unwilling to grant this privilege; and the effect of this amendment is to strike out all that portion of the bill which enables them to build a railroad track from their present depot upon Maryland avenue over to Pennsylvania avenue. It prohibits the extension of the track through the public grounds and the building of a depot over there. That is the only difference.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of section [two] one the following proviso:

Provided, That unless the railroad company herein named shall in good faith have commenced the work of underground excavation referred to in this section, and shall have expended at least $100,000 in the progress thereof within twelve months after the passage of this act, then the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company is hereby authorized to extend the Washington branch of their road along the route and in the manner herein indicated, so as to connect with the road of the company first named at or near Sixth street on Maryland avenue, in Washington city; but unless said Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company shall immediately, on the failure of the Washington, Alexandria, and Georgetown Company, as aforesaid, commence and prosecute said work in good faith and shall expend not less than $300,000 in the underground excavation aforesaid within two years from the passage of this act, the companies herein named shall forfeit all the rights and privileges conferred by this act.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state the effect of this amendment. The House bill authorizes the Alexandria and Washington Railroad Company to build a tunnel east of the Capitol, and the committee are desirous that it shall be built. I understand, since this bill was introduced into the House, and in fact since the discussion of the question on another bill here in the Senate on a former occasion, (for Senators will remember that we had this question up and discussed it once before,) this Washington and Alexandria company has got into some difficulties, and therefore the probability is that it will not undertake the construction of this work, which will cost more than $1,000,000. It is to tunnel the public grounds east of the Capitol, and it will cost at least $1,000,000, perhaps more; and the Senate committee are not of the opinion that this company will be able to construct it. It is very desirable, if this company is not able to undertake the work, that some company should do it and get the cars from off the public grounds in front of the Capitol.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does this bill authorize the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to do it?

Mr. HENDERSON. Unless the Washington and Alexandria company shall undertake the work of making this tunnel, and in good faith expend $100,000 within twelve months upon it, then the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company are authorized to go on with the work, and this company will have nothing further to do with it. That is the meaning of the amendment.

Mr. NYE. I am opposed to the amendment. I do not know, and I should like to inquire, whether the Baltimore and Ohio railroad have asked this committee for the right to construct a road over a portion of the road that belongs to another company.

Mr. HENDERSON. It does not belong to any company.

Mr. NYE. Does it not belong to this Alexandria company?

Mr. HENDERSON. Not an inch of it.

Mr. NYE. I am opposed to this amendment for this reason: the Senator who reports this bill says there is no probability that this Alexandria company can do this work.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is stronger than I said. We are afraid they will not be able to do it.

Mr. NYE. He is afraid that they will not be able to do it. Now, sir, there have been persistent efforts to get another railroad to this District, or another company running parallel to this Baltimore and Ohio railroad, which seems to hold almost supreme control over this District, as it does over every other community upon which it has got its strong hand. If there is to be a bill of this sort passed I would prefer that it should be a bill giving the Baltimore and Ohio railroad authority to do what they please in this District, and that no other company should have authority to come in here. I know there has been another company trying to get in here all winter, and the committee reported against it. For that reason I am opposed to granting to this company a work which there is no probability that this other road can do—a tunnel which is to cost $1,000,000, nearly as much as their whole road will cost. The effect of it is nothing more than to give to the Baltimore and Ohio railroad the opportunity of doing it and controlling this tunnel and the other road. I am afraid that the Alexandria company will not do it, and I am opposed to giving it to the Baltimore and Ohio railroad.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think my friend from Nevada does not exactly understand what the object of this improvement is. It is not for the benefit of the Baltimore and Ohio road.

Mr. NYE. I suppose it is to make a connection between the Baltimore and Ohio road and the Alexandria road.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is to make the connection between the North and the South. The difficulty in which this Alexandria company is placed, from what I have seen and heard from some of those interested in it, is not that the company was not originally sound and would not have been able to complete this work, but that they may not be able to do it now. There has been a fraudulent over-issue of stock to the amount of several hundred thousand dollars. Whether that was done under circumstances binding upon the company, I am not prepared to say; but I am inclined to think, notwithstanding their embarrassed condition, that they will be able to make this improvement. But if they should not do it, it is now proposed to authorize the Baltimore and Ohio company to make the improvement. It seems to me that ought to be done. It will not interfere with the bill which is now before Congress, and which will be acted upon, I suppose, at the next session, to authorize a company chartered by Maryland to run a line from the peninsula, on Maryland soil, beginning opposite Aquia creek, through certain counties in that State, to come here, if Congress think proper to authorize them to come here; nor if that company should come here would it answer the purpose which this will answer, provided the improvement is made—a continuous uninterrupted line of travel from New Orleans to New York and Boston.

Mr. NYE. I think it entirely unnecessary to put any company to this enormous expense for the purpose of making the connection between these two railroads in this city. The avenue of this city through which they propose to run is a very wide avenue, and there has been a railroad running through it since 1861.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senate have already decided that they shall not have a continuance of that right. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] objected to allowing them to run their cars there any longer, and said they should not, if he could prevent it, until we provided for this work.

Mr. NYE. I do not know that that necessarily determines it.

Mr. HENDERSON. The bill was postponed by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. NYE. I do not know, even though the bill has been postponed, that that necessarily determines the question, and I do know that any one objection to it necessarily postpones it. But, sir, I assert that there is no necessity whatever, consulting the safety and the interests of this city, for the company to spend one or two million dollars in tunneling under the public grounds for the purpose of forming a connection with this Baltimore and Ohio railroad. There are many of our cities, such as Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, and Utica, cities as populous as this and with much narrower streets, through which railroad trains run with entire safety to the public and entire safety to person. I insist upon it that it is wrong for Congress to impose such a condition upon any company as the making of this enormous outlay for the purpose of forming this connection between the North and the South.

I have another objection to it. The Baltimore and Ohio railroad is the controlling monopoly of this section of our country, and they will not allow—if their power is sufficient to resist it—any other railroad to come into this District. If we propose to build from here to New York an air-line railroad, over which passengers can go with more speed and more safety, we are met here by the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, who oppose it. When the line, of which the Senator from Maryland speaks, comes here, as it has been here all the winter to my knowledge, asking permission to run into this District with that railroad, the Baltimore and Ohio railroad oppose it; but the Baltimore and Ohio road can get permission to go anywhere they please, under ground or above ground, almost, and to connect their road with the West anywhere. The Baltimore and Ohio road are omnipotent. Now, this poor concern that my friend from Maryland says has been defrauded out of several hundred thousand dollars—

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand so; I do not know that it is so.

Mr. NYE. I have no doubt it is true; and assuming it to be true, the committee impose upon that poor, defrauded skeleton of a company the necessity of spending one or two million dollars to make a tunnel, which they know they will not make. What is it for? It is to give the Baltimore and Ohio railroad the supreme command of all the railroads that come into this District. That is what it means in plain English. I desire to enter my protest against it. I insist upon it that there shall be a vote by yeas and nays on this amendment, and the views of the Senate expressed upon it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I must confess the greatest astonishment I have ever felt in my life at the remarks of the Senator from Nevada. I am profoundly astonished. I feel anxious to have this connection between the Baltimore and Ohio road and some road leading to the South. The whole committee have felt the greatest anxiety upon that subject during the winter, and we have put our heads together to devise some plan by which it can be done. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] a short time ago introduced a bill for the purpose of extending the public grounds; and it is perfectly apparent, if the capital is to remain here, and the legislation of this session shows it, that in the course of a few years all these public grounds will be improved, and then the idea of the Senator that railroad trains can be run across the public grounds is perfectly monstrous. He must know that the Senate will not permit it; that the House of Representatives will not permit it; and if we are to have any connection at all between the Washington branch of the Baltimore and Ohio road and the roads south of the Potomac river we must make it by a tunnel or permit them to run through the city. The Senator knows, just as well as he knows anything, that the city of Baltimore will not permit cars drawn by steam to pass through the city. No other city permits it. He knows that the city of Philadelphia does not permit it. He knows perfectly well that the trains have to be backed around the city of Philadelphia and across a bridge in order to get from here to New York. The city of Baltimore compels the Baltimore and Ohio and the Philadelphia and Wilmington Railroad Companies to run their cars by horse power through the streets of Baltimore. The city of Washington for the last two years has granted permission to this company to run through the city. We passed an act, saying that if the city of Washington granted them the privilege we would do so, and by permission of Congress and the city of Washington they have been allowed to run their cars by steam in front of the Capitol, but it has given rise to a good deal of complaint, and will not be permitted long, especially after the improvement of the Capitol grounds, and the Senator ought to know it.

Now, Mr. President, I never had any idea of permitting or asking the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to do this work; but Mr. Garrett came down here a few days ago and I saw him, and I begged of him if he would undertake to do this work to do it; but Mr. Garrett is just as much opposed to it as the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NYE. Why were you astonished, then?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not at all astonished at that. Mr. Garrett does not want to build this road if he can avoid it. The Senator talks about the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. I have nothing in the world to do with that road; I am no attorney for it; but I want to get this work done; and if I can persuade Mr. Garrett to undertake a work which will cost $1,000,000, and which will perhaps never be worth a cent to his company—I do not know that it will—I will do it in order to get rid of the steam cars on the streets of Washington city, and in order to get a continuous line by steam, from North to South, which I consider a matter of great importance. But Mr. Garrett is opposed to doing it at the expense of his company, and one reason that he suggested was that our committee this winter has compelled him to go to work and build a railroad from here to the Point of Rocks, at a cost of six or seven million dollars, when they have now ample rolling stock in the double-track road from here to the Point of Rocks, by way of the Relay House. It is true that it will save fifty or sixty miles by going over a direct road, and the West clamored for it. My friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has mentioned this subject repeatedly, and other Senators have spoken of it. They have clamored for a direct communication with the West; and by legislation this winter we have compelled the Baltimore and Ohio road to build that road; and it will not be worth five cents to them, because they have the rolling stock now to do all the business between here and the Point of Rocks. It takes perhaps two or three hours longer to go that way; but they have the capacity to do ten times the business that will be done from here to the West by a double-track road between here and the Point of Rocks now. The fact is that to gratify the people of the West we have imposed on the Baltimore and Ohio road the expenditure of seven or eight million dollars.

I do not appear here as the advocate of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad; but I hear a great deal said against the road that is unjust and unfounded. I have traveled on almost every railroad line in this country, and I take this opportunity to say that I have traveled as cheaply, as comfortably, and as safely on the Baltimore and Ohio road as upon any road that I ever traveled upon in this country. I am sure there is no line of road in this country upon which a passenger can travel cheaper than he does from here to the city of Wheeling. I undertake to say there is none over which he can travel to the city of New York cheaper, and I say further that there is no line of railroad, considering its length, upon which freight can be carried cheaper than on this road. I know that fact. I do object to one thing that the Baltimore road is guilty of, and that is that they will not check baggage from here to any point in the West. They take the same advantage that other roads do, and compel you to recheck your baggage in order to compel you, when going to the West, to travel over their own road.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no railroad in the United States that does that now, except the Baltimore and Ohio.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator says that no other road does it. He may be correct so far as this matter is concerned; but I happened to be, a few days ago—

Mr. STEWART. Let me call the yeas and nays on this proposition.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose you will hardly call them while I am speaking. I do not very often occupy the attention of the Senate, and this is a matter of importance. I do not believe the Senator from Nevada ever interrupted a gentleman before. I have scarcely known of his making an interruption, or asking any question, or calling the yeas and nays, heretofore, when a Senator was speaking. The Senator from Ohio says that the Baltimore and Ohio road is guilty of a wrong that is inflicted by no other company. That may be true.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ought to say that that was merely a casual remark, and the president of the road says he is going to correct it.

Mr. HENDERSON. That remark was legitimate, but calling for the yeas and nays when a Senator is speaking is not legitimate. I am not complaining of the remark of the Senator from Ohio. I desire to say that the railroad companies all over the country are guilty of things just as bad as those complained of in the Baltimore and Ohio company. I was at Niagara some time ago. There is a road from Niagara up to the city of Buffalo. There you strike the Erie road. Now, at Niagara you can take a direct road over the New York Central to New York city; but if you want to take the New York Central up to Buffalo, and there take the Erie, the New York Central has it so arranged that you get into Buffalo five or ten minutes after the train starts out on the Erie road. It does not matter how the Erie road arrange their trains, the New York Central having the line from Niagara falls, only twenty miles up to Buffalo, so arrange the coming in of their trains that you are bound to go on from Buffalo over the New York Central anyhow, or else lay over for ten or twelve hours there. That is as bad as anything complained of in the Baltimore and Ohio road. I know that the railroad companies are guilty of this thing all over the country. They undertake to force passengers and freight over their roads, and any advantage they can take of that sort they do. How far legislation ought to be indulged in in Congress in order to correct this evil I am not able to say. I will go with the Senator from Nevada very far to correct it. I will go to the full extent of the legislative powers of Congress under the Constitution, and I am prepared any day to listen to an argument from him demonstrating that we have the power to do it, and I shall listen to it very favorably, because these evils ought to be corrected. I think, too, that we should correct the evil which is complained of in regard to the Baltimore and Ohio company. If they refuse to give this facility that is asked, it ought to be corrected; it is wrong; but in all other respects I tell the Senator from Nevada and every other Senator that the Baltimore and Ohio road is complained of very unjustly. I have seen no disposition on their part to oppress the people or inflict any great wrong or injury upon them. I know nothing about their management further than the facts to which I have now alluded.

Of course the Senator can defeat this measure, if he desires to do so, by calling the yeas and nays. I tell him now that perhaps this Washington and Alexandria Railroad Company can build this tunnel. I do not want to take away from them the power to do it. I desire them to do it, because they moved first in this matter. The Baltimore and Ohio company do not want to do it. They do not want to make this expenditure, because they are called upon to make an expenditure immediately of seven or eight million dollars for building a road from here to the Point of Rocks, and they have not the money to expend on this tunnel, and do not want to do it. I fear very much that, even if we give this power to the Baltimore and Ohio company, they will not do it.

Now, here is a difficulty to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator. In one of the amendments reported by the committee we give permission to this Washington and Alexandria Railroad Company to run their cars by steam across the streets of this city for twelve months longer. The time within which they were allowed to do it has now expired; they have no further authority to do it; and we propose to extend the time. The Senate, in the former investigation of this matter, said that they would not extend the time unless the work was immediately commenced on this tunnel so as to avoid running over the public grounds, and that if they did not see a disposition to build it immediately they would withdraw this privilege of running cars over the public grounds. Now, the Senate committee have given them this privilege for twelve months longer in another amendment which has been reported to this bill, and I hope that the Senator, if he desires to call the yeas and nays, will call them upon the bill after we shall have the whole bill before us. We give this privilege for twelve months longer, and then say that unless within twelve months they shall show a disposition to build this tunnel, so that Congress within a year from now may know whether they will build a tunnel or not, we must close up the public grounds and prevent their passing over them. That seems to be the disposition of the Senate. I feel no anxiety about this matter; I feel no interest in it except to see a continuous line between the North and the South; and I do hope my friend, under the circumstances, will withdraw his objections to the bill.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator will remember that a year from this time we shall not be in session, and how can Congress know whether the work of tunneling is going on or not?

Mr. HENDERSON. That may be; but within a very short time after that we shall be in session.

Mr. NYE. I do not like to occupy the time of the Senate upon this question; but still I think I see there is to be a great wrong inflicted upon this little company.

Mr. HENDERSON. If it is in my power to do it I will withdraw the amendment. Mr. Garrett does not want to build this tunnel. I am trying to force it upon him.

Mr. NYE. I should like to ask the Senator how Congress can compel the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to build this tunnel.

Mr. HENDERSON. We cannot do it except in this way.

Mr. NYE. I want to know when and how.

Mr. HENDERSON. We can say to them that they shall no longer have the privilege of running locomotives through the city unless they go to work and begin tunneling over some other line, and that will hold out an inducement to them.

Mr. NYE. The question I want to ask the Senator from Missouri is this: by what legislation, and when was it, that you compelled the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to expend seven or eight million dollars to build this cross-road to the Point of Rocks?

Mr. HENDERSON. The effect of our legislation was to compel them to do so.

Mr. NYE. What authority has Congress to compel any company to expend seven or eight million dollars?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have not got time to state it now.

Mr. NYE. I guess not. Does the Senator mean to say that that road to the Point of Rocks was not commenced before this?

Mr. HENDERSON. It has never been commenced at all.

Mr. NYE. It has been talked of for a number of years by this company.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is not commenced now.

Mr. NYE. All I wish to say is this: every effort that we make to open a channel of communication between here and the city of New York or any other point where this road has its fangs, meets with its stern and stubborn opposition, and they claim, and it has been claimed for them on this floor, that by their vested rights they have a right to control this thing; and I know that they stand like a wall against letting any railroad into this city except what they control. I do not propose by my vote to put the capital of this nation under the control of the capital of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company or any other corporation.

I should like to ask the Senator one more question. Where on the public grounds does this road run now?

Mr. HENDERSON. Right in front of the Capitol.

Mr. NYE. Precisely so; but that is a public street.

Mr. HENDERSON. We have passed a bill to extend the Capitol grounds.

Mr. NYE. But the Capitol grounds are not to be extended this year, and what is the hurry?

Mr. HENDERSON. There is nothing to prevent their being extended this year.

Mr. NYE. The grounds are not to be extended in that direction.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is not a street there. It belongs to the public grounds, and the botanical garden beyond it belongs to the public grounds.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire if this bill provides for an extension of the time within which the road is to run in front of the Capitol.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir; for twelve months.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly there ought to be a full session of the Senate before we vote on that. It has been discussed in the Senate heretofore and voted down on a fair vote.

Mr. HENDERSON. That bill was postponed simply because we had no provision in it for forcing them to commence the tunneling. The Senate said they would not give them the privilege to run on the public grounds unless they manifested a disposition to go on and make a tunnel and get off the public grounds. That is just what this bill does.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think it safe for cars to run there by steam.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then why not give them this privilege of tunneling?

Mr. STEWART. I do not feel very much inclined to give that company any extra privileges. They do not extend any to anybody else.

Mr. HENDERSON. What company?

Mr. STEWART. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have withdrawn the amendment in regard to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. What is the Senator talking about?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator report the amendment from the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir; but I ask the privilege of withdrawing the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be withdrawn by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. STEWART. Is it proposed to extend the time to the Baltimore and Ohio road to run in front of the Capitol until this other bankrupt company can construct the tunnel?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly not.

Mr. STEWART. We might as well give them the right perpetually as to do that.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is only the bankrupt company that is now authorized to run there—this poor, bankrupt company that the Senator's colleague has been talking about. The Baltimore and Ohio company now have nothing to do with it.

Mr. MORRILL. My friend, the Senator from Nevada, seems to be laboring under a misapprehension as to what this bill really is. It is applicable to the Alexandria company. The Alexandria company are running their cars now on the streets in front of the Capitol by sufferance. They were obliged, before they were authorized to run their road by steam there, to get the consent of the corporation of Washington, and also the consent of Congress. They got consent from the city of Washington, and early this session the Committee on the District of Columbia reported a bill giving the consent of Congress. That bill was rejected. It was said that it was not safe to grant that privilege, but that if this company would diverge their line and run east of the Capitol, through a tunnel, as they proposed to do, then we might temporarily allow them to run their cars in front of the Capitol until they could accomplish that purpose. This bill is to do that thing, and that is all there is of it.

Mr. STEWART. To run with steam?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir; while they are building the tunnel.

Mr. STEWART. At what rate of speed? Do you regulate that?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir; that is all regulated.

Mr. STEWART. How?

Mr. HENDERSON. If you will only listen to the amendments, you will find that that is all provided for.

Mr. MORRILL. That is all there is in this bill. The Senator who has charge of the bill, it seems, anticipating that they might not accomplish this work, and that thus it would fail utterly, and there would be no connection across the city if they did not do it, authorized this other company, the Baltimore and Ohio company, to do it. That amendment is withdrawn. The only question, therefore, is whether we will authorize this company to diverge their line east of the Capitol, through a tunnel, and make a connection off here with the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and in the mean time grant them the authority to run their cars by steam in front of the Capitol, which they have no authority to do now. I understood it to be the sense of the Senate, on a former occasion, that we would authorize them to do that temporarily, until they could make this connection; and we have made this bill, as we understood, in conformity with the former judgment of the Senate. That is all there is of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment reported by the committee will be read.

The Secretary read the next amendment, which was in section [three] two, lines six and seven, to strike out the words "Sixth street, and also at its intersection with;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of sections three and four of the act to which this is an amendment shall be applicable to the extension of said road or tracks as hereby authorized, and that it shall be lawful for said company to construct a draw or other bridge across the Washington canal at its intersection with D street south, of such plans and dimensions as may be approved by the corporation of Washington, and so as not to interfere with the navigation of said canal. And also to use steam power in the transportation of passengers and freight over said railroad and branches, subject, however, to such restrictions and regulations as may be imposed by the corporate authorities of the city of Washington in respect to such portion thereof as may be located in said city.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section three the following:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the consent of Congress be, and the same is hereby, granted for a period of twelve months from the passage of this act to the Alexandria, Washington, and Georgetown Railroad Company to use steam power in drawing the cars of said company on the structure across the Potomac river erected by said company under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to extend the charter of the Alexandria and Washington Railroad Company, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and along the railway now laid by said company, or which may be hereafter laid, under the provisions of the said act, along Maryland avenue and First street west, in the city of Washington, to the present depot of the Washington branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, subject always, and in all particulars, to such restrictions and regulations concerning the use of such steam power as the corporation of the city of Washington may, by its ordinances, at any time impose on the railroad company: Provided, That the said company shall not propel their engines at a greater rate of speed than five miles per hour within the corporate limits of Washington city.

Mr. NYE. I suggest to the gentlemen having this bill in charge that that time had better be made eighteen months instead of twelve. As suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, at the end of twelve months Congress will not be in session. Nobody expects that this tunnel will be completed in twelve months; and it will be but fair to have this privilege expire during the session of Congress, so that they can renew it if they desire to do so.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. NYE. I move then to amend the amendment by striking out "twelve" and inserting "eighteen."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was to strike out the fourth and fifth sections of the bill, as follows:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said railroad company shall be required to pay any and all damages that may result to private property from the extension of said road, and the tunneling under the several lots and squares of ground as heretofore provided; and that in the event the owner or owners of such property and the said company cannot agree as to the amount of such damages, or the value of any private property so appropriated for the purposes of such extension of said road, such proceedings shall thereupon be had for the appropriation and assessment of the damages thereof as are authorized and required under the laws now in force in the District of Columbia regulating appropriations and assessment of damages for opening roads, streets, and alleys in said District. That upon the payment to the owner or owners of the amount of such award of damages, or the lawful tender thereof, together with the payment of all costs of such proceedings, the said company shall acquire the right to use and occupy for the purposes of said railroad all such lands so appropriated, in such a manner as may be necessary for the proper working and running said road.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if at any time any other railroad company shall or may desire to use and occupy the said tunnel so authorized by this act, either on the same track or another one alongside thereof, any such company shall have the right to do so upon such fair and reasonable terms as may be agreed upon by said parties to such joint occupancy. In case parties cannot agree on terms, the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall fix the terms.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time and passed.

AQUEDUCT BRIDGE AT GEORGETOWN.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 395, the only remaining bill that we have.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope not. This is the only bill remaining. Let us take it up at any rate and dispose of it in some way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky withdraw his motion?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir, for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 395) relating to the aqueduct bridge of the Alexandria Canal Company over the Potomac river at Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, was read a second time.

The Secretary commenced the reading of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. The bill has been taken up; it is a bill of some length; and I will now move that the Senate adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Let the bill be read through.

Mr. DAVIS. It might as well not be read; the majority of the members will know no more about it than if it was not read. I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at fifteen minutes past ten o'clock) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 20, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

On motion of Mr. BANKS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

NATIONAL CEMETERIES.

Mr. DEMING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to establish and to protect national cemeteries; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' NATIONAL FAIR.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution relating to the building lately occupied for a national fair in aid of the orphans of the soldiers and sailors of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

It provides that the building recently occupied for the national fair, with the materials of which it is composed, and the tools used in its construction and necessary to keep it in repair, shall be appropriated to the use of the directors of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home for an additional fair in aid of said orphans, and for other purposes deemed by the directors to be expedient in furtherance of this national charity.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD BONDS.

Mr. PRICE, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, by unanimous consent, reported back House bill No. 772, to authorize the issue of certain bonds in denominations greater than $1,000, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read. It provides that hereafter bonds of the United States, authorized by the act of July 1, 1862, to aid in the construction of railroad and telegraph lines from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and by the acts amendatory thereof, may be issued in denominations greater than $1,000 at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury; provided, however, that it shall at all times be optional with any railroad company whether they will receive bonds of a larger denomination than $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. PRICE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAPPING GOVERNMENT WATER-PIPES.

Mr. F. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, by unanimous consent, reported back House bill No. 775, in relation to the unlawful tapping of Government water-pipes.

The bill was read. It declares the unlawful tapping of any water-pipes laid down in the District of Columbia by authority of the United States to be a misdemeanor and an indictable offense, and upon conviction of such an offense in the criminal court of the District of Columbia imposes a penalty not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding one year. And it is made the special duty of the Commissioner of Public Buildings to bring to the notice of the attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia or to the grand jury any infraction of that law.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. F. THOMAS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EQUALIZATION OF PAY OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee of Accounts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to equalize the pay of the officers and employés of the House of Representatives, to prohibit an allowance of extra compensation, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, together with the accompanying tables, and recommitted.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 3) to revive the grade of General in the United States Army; when the Speaker signed the same.

ADMISSION OF TENNESSEE.

Mr. BINGHAM. I demand the regular order.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the regular order, being the unfinished business of yesterday, which was House joint resolution No. 83, concerning the State of Tennessee, on which Mr. BINGHAM was entitled to the floor.

The pending question was on the substitute offered by Mr. BINGHAM, on which he had demanded the previous question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I withdraw the demand for the previous question in order to modify verbally the substitute.

The substitute, as modified, was read as follows:

Joint resolution declaring Tennessee again entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Whereas the State of Tennessee has in good faith ratified the article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the Legislatures of the several States, and has also shown, to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to her due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Tennessee is hereby restored to her former proper, practical relation to the Union, and is again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress, duly elected and qualified, upon their taking the oaths of office required by existing laws.

Mr. BINGHAM. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman yield to allow an amendment to be offered?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will allow it to be read, reserving my right to the floor.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. BOUTWELL, as follows:

That whenever Tennessee shall have ratified the amendment to the Constitution proposed to the Legislatures of the several States by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and shall have established an equal and just system of suffrage for all male citizens within its jurisdiction who are not less than twenty-one years of age, the Senators and Representatives of such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted into Congress as such: Provided, That nothing in this section contained shall be construed as to require the disfranchisement of any loyal person who is now entitled to vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. I cannot yield to allow that to be offered.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have a vote upon it, and express our sentiments upon it.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir.

Mr. WARD. I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer a substitute.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will allow it to be read, but not to be offered at present.

The Clerk read Mr. WARD's amendment, as follows:

Whereas the State of Tennessee has in good faith ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the Legislatures of the several States, and has shown otherwise to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States do hereby recognize the government of the State of Tennessee, inaugurated under and by the convention which assembled on the 9th day of January, 1865, at the city of Nashville, as the legitimate government of said State, entitled to the guarantee and all other rights of a State government under the Constitution of the United States.

Be it resolved, &c. That the State of Tennessee is hereby declared to be restored to her former proper, practical relations to the Union, and again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress, duly elected and qualified, upon their taking the oaths of office required by existing laws.

Mr. BINGHAM. I cannot yield for that.

Mr. LE BLOND. I ask my colleague to yield to me to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will allow it to be read, retaining the floor.

The Clerk read Mr. LE BLOND's amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting words and insert as follows:

That the State of Tennessee is entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress, duly elected and qualified, upon taking the oath of office.

Mr. BINGHAM. I cannot yield for that purpose. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The question was put upon seconding the demand for the previous question, and there were—ayes 69, noes 7; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BINGHAM and LE BLOND were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes ninety-four, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I now demand a separate vote on the preamble and resolution.

The SPEAKER. That will be in order after the vote on the substitute. The question will be first on the preamble and then on the joint resolution.

The substitute was agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the joint resolution, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I desire to make a suggestion to my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] in regard to a verbal amendment of his resolution. My recollection of the Constitution is that it provides for the ratification by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States. I suggest to my colleague that he substitute for the words "State of Tennessee" the words "Legislature of the State of Tennessee."

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, that is not necessary at all.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object to any modification.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question recurred upon ordering the preamble to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BROMWELL. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. RAYMOND. I rise to make an inquiry of the Chair: I understand the Chair to decide that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] as a substitute for the original resolution has been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. RAYMOND. But it has not yet been read the third time?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. RAYMOND. And the question is now upon ordering the preamble to be engrossed and read a third time?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. RAYMOND. After the preamble shall have been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, can we then have separate votes on the resolution and preamble?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read from page 137 of the Digest:

"In the case of a resolution with a preamble there is no difficulty as to the time at which the preamble is to be considered, nor in any case in Committee of the Whole; but in the House, in the case of a bill with a preamble, there is some uncertainty as to the particular stage in which the bill must be when it is proper to consider the preamble. It would seem that it might appropriately be done after the bill has been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and before the third reading takes place. By this course the bill can be engrossed either with or without the preamble, as the House shall have determined. But where a separate vote on the preamble is not asked for before the bill is read a third time, the preamble is considered as adopted."

The resolution has been ordered to be engrossed, and the question now recurs whether the preamble shall be engrossed. If the House vote against engrossing the preamble, then the resolution itself only will be read the third time. The only way in which a separate vote can be had upon the preamble is by calling for it now.

Mr. RAYMOND. If the preamble shall be ordered to be engrossed, will there be any way afterwards of obtaining separate votes upon the preamble and resolution?

The SPEAKER. There will not.

Mr. RAYMOND. Then, for the purpose of obtaining those separate votes, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. BINGHAM. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] can arrive at what he desires by calling for a separate vote on ordering the preamble to be engrossed.

Mr. RAYMOND. But we do not have the yeas and nays on the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. We can have them on the passage.

Mr. RAYMOND. I understand the Chair to decide that the resolution and the preamble must be voted on together.

The SPEAKER. If the preamble shall be ordered to be engrossed, it will be read and voted upon with the resolution.

Mr. RAYMOND. Then, for the purpose of having separate votes upon the preamble and the resolution, I ask the House to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order, I called for separate votes upon the preamble and resolution, and understood the Chair to state that that right was reserved to me.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand the Chair now to decide that if the preamble is ordered to be engrossed and read a third time then we cannot have separate votes upon them.

The SPEAKER. Separate votes cannot be had after the order for engrossment, but they can be had now. After the resolution has been ordered to be engrossed, if any member desires a separate vote upon the preamble it can be had before the third reading of the resolution upon ordering the preamble to be engrossed.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. RAYMOND to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I would inquire, if we vote against ordering the preamble to be engrossed, will not that secure what my colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] wants, a separate vote?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly it will.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Why is not that all he wants?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is all we need.

Mr. RAYMOND. I withdraw the motion to reconsider the vote upon ordering the resolution to be engrossed, and ask for a separate vote upon ordering the preamble to be engrossed.

Mr. BINGHAM. I call for the previous question upon ordering the preamble to be engrossed.

Mr. DAWSON. I rise to a question of order. When the Chair stated that the question was upon ordering the resolution to be engrossed and read a third time, I demanded the yeas and nays, and the Chair recognized my demand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman called for the yeas and nays upon ordering the preamble to be engrossed, but afterward withdrew that call.

Mr. DAWSON. The Chair, I beg to state, is in error. My call for the yeas and nays was upon ordering the resolution to be engrossed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdrew his call for the yeas and nays, and it was too late to renew it after several members had put inquiries to the Chair, as will be seen by reference to the Globe to-morrow.

Mr. JENCKES. I renew the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 29, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Davis, Dawes, Eggleston, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Gloss, Groener, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James E. Hubbell, Hulburd, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Kerr, Ketchum, Koontz, Kuykendall, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lynch, McClurg, McKuer, Meurer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Nicholson, Neill, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—104.

YAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ancona, Benjamin, Boutwell, Boyer, Conkling, Dawson, Eldridge, Eliot, Finck, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Jencks, Johnson, Kelley, Le Blond, McCullough, Niblack, Phelps, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Stevens, Thornton, Trimble, and Williams—29.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bundy, Chanler, Cook, Culom, Culver, Darling, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, Kelso, Loan, Longyear, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McIndoe, McKee, Patterson, Pomeroy, Raymond, Sawyer, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, Winfield, and Wright—49.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The question then recurred on ordering the preamble to be engrossed and read a third time, on which Mr. BINGHAM had called for the previous question.

Mr. LE BLOND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. A portion of us here desire to vote for the resolution, while we—

Several MEMBERS. That is no question of order.

Mr. LE BLOND. We do not fully concur with the implication contained in the preamble; yet, by the ruling of the Speaker—

Mr. THAYER, Mr. PRICE, and others. We object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The remarks of the gentleman from Ohio do not, in the opinion of the Chair, present any point of order.

Mr. LE BLOND. I was about to present my point of order. According to the ruling of the Chair, as we understand it, if the preamble is ordered to be engrossed, we cannot have a separate vote upon the preamble and the resolution. This being the fact, some of us will be compelled to vote against the whole thing, in consequence of our objection to the preamble.

The SPEAKER. There is no precedent known to any gentleman here which sanctions the idea that, after a bill has been engrossed and the question recurs upon its passage, a part of the bill can be passed and a part rejected. According to uniform parliamentary usage that is impossible.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, which was upon ordering the preamble to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided it the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 48, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Dawes, DeForest, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Ketcham, Koontz, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lynch, McKuer, Meurer, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Benjamin, Boutwell, Boyer, Conkling, Dawson, Eldridge, Eliot, Finck, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Humphrey, Jencks, Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, Le Blond, McClurg, McCullough, Moorhead, Niblack, Nicholson, Neill, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Stevens, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Williams, and Wright—48.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Cook, Culom, Culver, Darling, Davis, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, Kelso, Loan, Longyear, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McIndoe, McKee, Patterson, Pomeroy, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, and Winfield—47.

So the preamble was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

During the vote,

Mr. RADFORD stated that his colleague, Mr. WINFIELD, was detained at home by illness.

Mr. JOHNSON stated that his colleague, Mr. DENISON, was detained at home by serious illness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MOULTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and joint resolution were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, demanded the reading of the preamble and joint resolution as engrossed.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolution as engrossed.

Mr. BINGHAM demanded the previous question on the passage of the preamble and joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the preamble and resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand a separate vote on the preamble and joint resolution in conformity to the uniform usage in this House.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will show a single ruling during this or any previous Congress the Chair will entertain his demand for a separate vote. There has not been a single one during the eleven years of service of the Chair in this House.

Mr. BINGHAM. I rise under the rule to close the debate on the resolution; but first I will yield thirty minutes of my hour to my colleague on the committee on reconstruction, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am not ignorant, Mr. Speaker, of the fact that the votes of the House already taken foreshadow conclusively its purpose to pass the pending joint resolution for the admission of Tennessee. I can see many reasons which operate on the minds of others as they do upon my own mind tending to such a course; but after the most careful reflection during months and years I am still as deeply convinced as ever of the dangerous nature of this proceeding. While I am conscious that my voice falls upon unwilling ears; that it is the fixed purpose of the House in the presence of a great political struggle to adopt this measure, and though I am the humblest of the members of this body, with less right than any other man to address the country, and with no hope whatever that my words will reach posterity, I yet avail myself of the kindness of the gentleman who has charge of this resolution and raise my voice here and now and for the last time against the consummation of this scheme.

This morning I offered an amendment, on which, however, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] declined to allow the House to vote, which embodies my opinions concerning the admission of Tennessee. If gentlemen observed the language of that amendment they are aware that I have in some degree departed from my own settled convictions as to the right of all men to the enjoyment of the elective franchise in deference to what I understand to be the judgment of the majority of this House, and possibly at this time to what is the judgment of the loyal people of the country. The resolution that I proposed provided for impartial suffrage in that State by the act of its own people as a condition precedent to its admission to the exercise of power in the government. It secured justice to the colored people of Tennessee first, and then to the colored people of the revolted and still rebellious section of this country.

I am not troubled by the informalities apparent in the proceedings of the Tennessee Legislature upon the question of ratifying the constitutional amendment. It received the votes of a majority of the members of a full House, and when the proper officers shall have made the customary certificate and filed it in the Department of State, it is not easy to see how any legal objection can be raised, even if two thirds of the members were not present, although that proportion is a quorum according to the constitution of the State.

My objections are not technical, but vital and fundamental. First, the government which they submit here, and which by your preamble and by your vote you declare under the Constitution to be a republican form of government, is not, as it appears to me, such in fact. I have not time now in these thirty minutes to trace the history of the opinions entertained by the founders of the Republic as to what constitutes a republican form of government. But if they identified themselves with any opinion or idea upon this subject, it was this: that whenever powers were conferred by hereditary rules upon a class of men, or whenever by hereditary rules a class of men were excluded from all participation in the government, that government was necessarily anti-republican in form as well as in fact. I do not assert that it is necessary that every man should vote, and that a government in which terms and conditions are imposed is necessarily anti-republican; but the terms and conditions must be reasonable; they must be such as to render it not only possible but probable that the great majority will be able to meet the requirements of the law.

What is this House to-day, in the name of the people of this country and under the Constitution, declaring? That a State constitution by which more than eighty thousand male citizens are forever, for themselves and for their posterity, deprived of all part in the government of that State is republican in form. Sir, that government is an aristocracy; it is an oligarchy; it is not republican; it is not democratic. Wherever a man and his posterity are forever disfranchised from all participation in the government, that government is not republican in form.

Next, are we to question the existence of the power on our part to accomplish that which I now suggest ought to be accomplished—the enfranchisement of the freedmen of Tennessee, as the beginning of the great work of reconstruction upon a republican basis? We have positive power with reference to the States that have been in rebellion, which we have exercised by the passage of the act establishing and continuing the Freedmen's Bureau and by the passage of the civil rights bill.

I do not now discuss the question whether we have the power directly to enfranchise the negroes of Tennessee and of the other States recently in rebellion. I have an opinion upon the question, but I offer no argument in its support at the present time. I believe that that power exists in Congress; but now I appeal to the negative power of the Government that we may reject Tennessee, North Carolina, Arkansas, until they perform this act of justice, for the country, for the negroes, for themselves. In thus requiring an additional act of justice on their part as a condition precedent to their return to the enjoyment of their former power in the country, we have the authority of President Lincoln, of President Johnson, and of numerous acts of this Congress and of the last Congress. We have exacted conditions precedent to the admission of those States to representative power in the Government of the country. Through Presidents Lincoln and Johnson the country insisted upon the ratification of the amendment abolishing slavery, the repudiation of the rebel debt, and now we demand, even in the case of Tennessee, the ratification of the pending amendment to the Constitution equalizing representation and all as conditions precedent to the exercise of power in the Government. With equal, if not with more justice, we may demand an impartial system of suffrage.

Nor can it be maintained with propriety that this exaction shall not be made because there are States, exercising their full functions as such, in which the negroes are excluded from the ballot-box? The injustice in those States is not of such magnitude as to endanger the peace and safety of the country; while in the case of the rebellious States there seems only the alternative of equal suffrage through the demands of the Government on the one hand and civil or social war on the other. Hence, while we may condemn the exclusion of negroes from the ballot-box in States now represented in Congress, there may be no public necessity for an attempt to remedy the wrong by the action of the General Government. Moreover, in the case of the loyal States the General Government cannot apply a remedy except by affirmative, positive action, for which the country is not prepared, and for which there is no controlling public necessity. In the case of the States lately in rebellion we are not under the necessity of taking affirmative legislative action. The proceeding on our part is simply and wholly within the domain of the precedents cited and the authority of the Constitution. The abolition of slavery by the Constitution has given a new meaning to the phrase "republican government;" for it is now settled that a State in which slavery exists is not republican in form according to our Constitution, though previous to the ratification of the amendment the fact may have been otherwise. While slavery existed it was generally true, however, that all free citizens were voters. To this rule there were some exceptions, but they were few and relatively unimportant.

I proceed now to consider the expediency of this measure. There are in Tennessee not less than two hundred thousand able-bodied adult male citizens, and you are consenting that the political power of that State shall be put into the hands of less than sixty thousand. By the constitution of Tennessee more than half the white male citizens of that State are disfranchised. Of this I do not complain; but in addition thereto eighty thousand male colored citizens of the State are also disfranchised, making an aggregate of one hundred and forty thousand men who are excluded from participation in the government. The sixty thousand loyal white men come here and ask to be accepted as a State, and you are solemnly resolving, in the presence of the country and with the light of history and the traditions of the Republic, that the government is republican in form.

What do you invite and invoke in the future? Do you suppose that these sixty thousand rebels are to rest quiet under their exclusion from political power in the government of that State for any considerable number of years? Such an expectation, if entertained, will not be realized. On the other hand, this action invites and renders necessary a combination between the eighty thousand colored men and the sixty thousand rebels. The rebels, forgetting their past prejudices, and the loyal blacks, forgetting the disloyalty of the sixty thousand rebels, will join hands and overturn the government of the State. And what you are doing to-day for Tennessee you are to be invited hereafter to do for the other ten States of the South. There is only an alternative. It is in this: that the four million colored people shall escape from the tyranny which you authorize the southern oligarchs to exercise over them. And I bid the people, the working people of the North, the men who are struggling for subsistence, to beware of the day when the southern freedmen shall swarm over the borders in quest of those rights which should be secured to them in their native States. A just policy on our part leaves the black man in the South where he will soon become prosperous and happy. An unjust policy forces him from home and into those States where his rights will be protected, to the injury of the black man and the white man both of the North and the South. Justice and expediency are united in indissoluble bonds, and the men of the North cannot be unjust to the former slaves without themselves suffering the bitter penalty of transgression.

I ask of this House what the answer is to be when the other ten States demand recognition and the admission of members. Do you say they shall not be admitted on the terms you now offer to Tennessee? What other terms will you exact of Arkansas, North Carolina, and South Carolina? You can exact none in addition to what you are now exacting, unless you demand for them what I now demand for the people of Tennessee—impartial suffrage for all loyal adult male citizens. And if you then hesitate to meet the question from which you now shrink—the right of the negro to vote—you will have no excuse for denying full political rights to the other ten States. Arkansas has complied with the conditions named in the preamble to the resolution, and you have no excuse for refusing to admit Arkansas except the excuse I now offer for refusing to admit Tennessee. You will have again upon you that question which you so much dread, but which cannot be postponed and which must be met, whether the colored men of the South, once in slavery but now free, are to be endowed with the rights of citizens of this country. But if you say, as you will say, unless the people rise in their majesty and demand justice for their suffering fellow-men, that these States may be admitted, as Tennessee is to-day to be admitted, then to what extremity of woe have you reduced the country! You have four million discontented loyal persons made discontented by your action. You have in the States of the South more than five million discontented rebellious white people. You compel these classes, naturally enemies, to unite under the force of circumstances which now you may control for the good of the country; and if, as we believe, the white race is the dominant race, at least for the time being, in intellect and intelligence, you thus give to the rebel class of the South the moral, physical, and political power which can be derived from the influence they will exercise over the four million blacks. Does any one believe that the blacks are to be exterminated? The old fable of Antæus is founded in the nature of man. They who labor on the soil never yet have been and probably they never can be exterminated. And consider further that the blacks are organized into churches; they are establishing everywhere schools; they are becoming the possessors of land; they have military knowledge. Do you expect that such a people, though yet in their infancy, are to be exterminated? They will continue to exist; they will thrive even under oppression; but the day may come, and I fear it may come soon if this policy be pursued, when they will assert by force and by dangerous combinations the natural rights with which they have been by God endowed.

And what do you offer to the loyal whites of the South? You offer them only submission, degradation, or expatriation. Do you suppose that when you have established in the other southern States governments like that of Tennessee, in which the disloyal whites are excluded and the loyal blacks are also excluded, the loyal whites can withstand for a moment the surging waves of public sentiment which will rise, and foam, and rage, however unjust and foul their origin? If, on the other hand, the negroes are permitted to vote, even in small numbers only in the beginning, they naturally become the allies and friends of the loyal whites of the South; and especially will they be our friends in any future controversy involving the integrity of the Union. No country can afford to disregard the rights or the power of an eighth of its population; and above all, it is dangerous for this Government to authorize or tolerate an unjust policy toward so large a proportion of its citizens.

There are in this country two great political public wrongs, one of which you have taken the proper means to remedy by an amendment to the Constitution, securing to a white man in the North equal political power with a white man in the South. We are agreed upon that. When a white man's rights are concerned, there is no difference of opinion upon this side of the House as to the necessity of protecting him. But there is another great wrong, for which you make no provision, offer no remedy, present no excuse, and that is the denial of the elective franchise to the black men of the South.

I must say for the gentlemen upon the other side of the House that they are consistent in this matter. They have never asserted the citizenship of the black man; they have denied it; they have never invited him into the Army nor called upon him to fight the battles of the Republic. They have, as far as they had the power, refused his services; and however wrong they may have been, they have been consistent in their course. But upon this side of the House it is otherwise. We have recently passed an amendment to the Constitution, to be submitted to the States, declaring that negroes are, under the Constitution, hereafter to be citizens, and now, when we have the power to secure for them the rights of citizens, we are silent. We have invited them into the armies of the Republic and now we abandon them to those who have been for years their enemies and oppressors. How are we to reconcile to ourselves, to our country, and to posterity this great inconsistency on our part?

I am as much attached to party as any man can be, but the jewel of the Republican party is its consistency based upon justice, and now we abandon justice and accept inconsistency as our policy. Is not the history of this country full of warning? I will not mention names, but from 1850 to the close of the rebellion the pathway of ambition for parties and for men has been strewn right and left with the fragments of parties and the remains of politicians that have proved false to justice, to humanity, and to republican principles. Do you inquire whether these States are to be forever excluded? By no means. We have assurances from North Carolina, Tennessee, Arkansas, and Texas that if this Congress will but demand impartial suffrage the people of those States who are loyal to the Union will enter the contest, second the demand for impartial suffrage, contend for it, and ultimately, as they believe, they will secure it. I speak under the impression, the firm conviction, that we to-day here surrender up the cause of justice, the cause of the country, in the vain hope that the admission of Tennessee may work somewhat for the advantage of the party which has controlled the country during these last six years. We surrender the rights of four million people; we surrender the cause of justice; we imperil the peace and endanger the prosperity of the country; we degrade ourselves as a great party which has controlled the Government in the most trying times in the history of the world. Fortunately will it be for us, for those whom we represent, and for the future of the country if these apprehensions shall not be realized; and, humble though I be, but in the full conviction that they are not groundless, I enter my earnest protest against this proceeding. Believing it to be wrong, I declare my convictions in the presence of those who have power to prevent the wrong; and I make the declaration with a sense of responsibility such as has never before rested upon me in any experience of my life.

Mr. Speaker, if my time is not consumed, I will, with the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] yield the remainder of it to the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no objection to that. Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, I would have preferred to have had the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWEN] occupy the remainder of his time, for I have been highly interested in what he has said, for I think he has spoken words which will be treasured in the future.

I will state briefly the reasons why I shall vote against this proposition. I have two prominent reasons against it. I would have yielded somewhat of one of them, provided I had seen a single shadow of hope coming from the State of Tennessee itself. I find on the examination of the constitution of Tennessee that the voting power is confined exclusively to the white population. If Tennessee would have even yielded to allow the colored men who had been soldiers to vote; or if they had even initiated a policy which might have grown to fullness hereafter, I might have consented to the proposition. Since the proposition that is now before the House assumes to dictate terms to the State of Tennessee, and of right assumes it, we also have the power to insist that that State shall recognize the great principle of which I have spoken.

My second objection to this proposition is that the amendment of the Constitution submitted by Congress to the Legislatures of the several States, although ratified by the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, has not become a portion of the Constitution of the United States. And since it has not become a part of the Constitution, then the restrictions that are contained within it have no application upon that State whatever. And Tennessee, if admitted at this session of Congress, will be admitted with the same number of Representatives that the State had when the rebellion commenced. We will thus find the representation of the several States very unequal, and it seems to me that the people of the free North will express not only dissatisfaction but indignation at such a proposition. I think there certainly should have been a restriction here to the effect that before the proposed amendment becomes a part of the Constitution of the United States Tennessee shall not be entitled to any more representation than she would be were the amendment in full operation and effect. I have briefly stated the two principal objections with me to the adoption of this resolution, and will not occupy more time of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of regret to me that any gentleman hitherto supposed to intend well for his country, hitherto supposed to stand with those who have maintained intact the Constitution, the Union, and the laws against the rebellion, the like of which the children of men had never before seen, should on the morning of this day, which is the dawn of that better day that will restore in all its unity and strength the Republic, shattered but not destroyed by the rebellion, should stand here in his place and repudiate the right of the law-abiding majority of the people to govern, the very principle out of which the Constitution itself and the Union originally sprang, and by the enforcement of which the Constitution and the Union have been maintained through these five years of war, and ask us in this hour of our triumph to surrender this sacred and essential right of the loyal majority, and say that the destiny of the Republic at last is to be in the hands of the minority or of a disloyal and treasonable majority. I repeat it, the gentleman asks us to deny the right of the loyal majority, either in the Republic or in the State, to rule. It ought to be a sufficient answer to such a demand to say traitors and rebels by their crime forfeited all political rights, and those who saved the Republic have the right to perpetuate it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has urged that Tennessee is without a republican government. Why? First, because the people, the loyal people of Tennessee, the men who stood by the Constitution and the Union in the darkest hours of this revolt, have, by the amendment of their fundamental and statute law, declared that rebels should not exercise voice or power in the State. They have so declared, and further, they have declared by their amended constitution that the ordinance of secession, passed May 6, 1861, "was an act of treason and usurpation, unconstitutional, null, and void;" that the league of the rebel confederation with Tennessee was also "an act of treason and usurpation; that slavery is forever abolished and prohibited throughout the State;" and what is still more significant, that "the Legislature shall make no law recognizing the right of property in man," and may determine the qualification of voters, without regard to race or color. Because of all this the gentleman declares that the government of Tennessee is not a republican government!

Mr. Speaker, I thought it was understood, I thought it was agreed upon by the defenders of the Republic, from the day that treason first fired on Sumter till this hour, that traitors forfeited their political rights, privileges, and powers under the governments, both State and national. I remember well, and I remember with pride, the hour when, in the midst of this great conflict, your legions were being mustered upon a hundred fields for the trial by battle, on which hung the nation's life, there was not a man of any party upon this floor who, upon being challenged, was willing to admit that the people in any State engaged in that mad revolt, and holding for the time by force of arms the power of the State, had the right to a single Representative here or to a single Senator in the other branch of the national Legislature. But now that rebellion has been conquered, and conquered by the aid of loyal men in Tennessee as well as elsewhere, the gentleman from Massachusetts stands here to-day to denounce loyal Tennessee—for what? For having disfranchised men who struck at the nation's life, for having disfranchised men who by their great crime disfranchised themselves. He might as well denounce the loyal men of Tennessee for not having given aid by arms to the traitors and their treason.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not wish to be misunderstood. The ground of my objection was the disfranchisement of the colored people. I made no complaint in regard to the disfranchisement of the rebels.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman spoke of the government of that State representing a minority. He spoke of the disfranchised white male citizens as being more than half of the white male citizens of the State, and denominated them the sixty thousand disfranchised rebels. Now, the gentleman declares the ground of his objection to be the disfranchised colored people, and that he does not complain of the disfranchisement of rebels. If he does not complain of the disfranchisement of rebels, if that is not the ground of his objection, then I submit there is no ground for the gentleman's denial that the government of Tennessee is republican in form, or for his assertion that it is an oligarchy. It is the government, sir, of a majority, and a large majority, of all its loyal people. It represents certainly one half, if not more than one half, the original white population of the State. Sixty-three thousand men, under the restrictions of the new constitution and laws, supported by their votes at the polls this organization in the State of Tennessee. When we consider the ravages that war has made, these sixty-three thousand loyal voters in Tennessee must represent four hundred and forty thousand of its white population.

What, then, is the gentleman's argument, now that he abandons the right of the rebels to vote? It is this, and only this, that the loyal white people of the State of Tennessee have not yet extended the elective franchise to the black population. Sir, there is no man on this floor who would have rejoiced more sincerely than myself if these loyal men in Tennessee had done that act of justice. The man who had the honor to report first in this House, when it was in the hands of the southern conspirators, a bill to repeal an existing slave code and the honor to see his bill passed through the House despite the reproaches and the curses of men who but a few years afterward took up arms against the Republic, might well be supposed to rejoice at such an act of justice. But, sir, remember that these sixty-three thousand white loyal voters in Tennessee see represent four hundred and forty thousand of the white population of the State. They are, therefore, almost as two to one of the black population. Yet the gentleman says because this white population, largely in the majority, have not extended the elective franchise to the black minority they have not organized a republican State. The gentleman asserts that it is our duty to reject this State for this cause alone! Why, then, does not the gentleman move the expulsion of Missouri from representation in this House? That State has a like black population disfranchised; a like white rebel population disfranchised; therefore that State is to-day in the hands of a white minority, and a very small minority if you count the disfranchised rebel population together with the disfranchised colored population. I cannot speak with certainty, but it is my impression that the disfranchised white population of Missouri is equal in numbers to its loyal white population. Why not cry out against this injustice in Missouri? Why not declare that the government of that State is not republican, but an odious oligarchy, and that her loyal freemen are not entitled to representation in Congress?

But, sir, this is not all. The gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] has made a mistake, and I ask him to correct it. He says that he looks into the constitution of the State of Tennessee, and finds that the word "white" is retained. Sir, to the dishonor of my own State, to the dishonor of his State, to the dishonor of a majority of the States north of Mason and Dixon's line, in the midst of this struggle and trial for the nation's life, these loyal men of Tennessee swept away that limitation in the text of her constitution, and by an amendment, sustained in the very storm of battle by the votes of more than forty thousand of her loyal men, declared that the Legislature of Tennessee may any day enfranchise with the ballot every loyal black man in her midst. The word "white" is not, therefore, retained in the constitution of Tennessee as a limitation upon the rights of colored citizens. It cannot therefore be said of loyal Tennessee, as it may be of many States represented here, that a citizen who has battled for the Republic through four years of war, who is covered with wounds received in its defense, is declared by the constitution forever disqualified to vote. When he shall vote rests with the people of that State. There I leave it.

Mr. HIGBY rose.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman will please not take up my time. I only say that I hope the gentleman will correct that in his speech.

Mr. FINCK. I ask my colleague to yield to me for one minute.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well.

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker, I give no consideration to the alleged ratification by Tennessee of the amendment referred to in the preamble. I do not believe it to be the act or expression of the people of that State. But, sir, the great overshadowing question is the right of Tennessee to be represented here. I believe she is so entitled. I want that State and all the States to enjoy their constitutional right of representation, and will vote for this resolution, but not consenting to, but protesting against, the preamble annexed to the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. We think that Tennessee ought to be represented.

Mr. FINCK. I believe it. I believe that all the States should be represented.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope my colleague will excuse me from further loss of time, and permit me to state the reasons why Tennessee should be admitted.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the gentleman intend to give no time to this side of the House?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will not object if it be not taken out of my time. Mr. Speaker, Tennessee to-day is as republican as Massachusetts on the principle that the majority of the law-abiding citizens of a State who have not forfeited their privileges by treason have the right to control its political power. That is the primal principle of American institutions, and that is the principle which the gentleman from Massachusetts comes here to-day to repudiate.

The restoration of the State of Tennessee in the mode proposed to her proper relations in the Union is no surrender of that principle unless you set up here the right of the rebels lately in arms to govern the loyal people, the rebels whom you undertake to disfranchise by the constitutional amendment, and which amendment I trust in God the American people will ratify and thereby disfranchise those who compassed the nation's life and filled the land with the graves of the nation's defenders. If the rebels are to be excluded from political power then, sir, the men who speak this day from Tennessee are the majority, overwhelmingly the majority of its free population, black and white included.

But, says the gentleman, they exclude from the elective franchise loyal black men who bore arms for the defense of the Republic. I admit it. So does Ohio, so does Pennsylvania, and so, also, do a majority of the States of the Union. Is that any reason, sir, that Tennessee should be denied representation in this House? It would be better if justice, equal and exact justice, were established in every State.

We are all for equal and exact justice, but justice for all is not to be secured in a day, and he is the wisest statesman and the most faithful to duty who will seize the opportunity this day presented to restore a State to its proper place in the Union; and thereby add one additional vote of a free people in aid of the final ratification of that amendment to the Constitution which provides for the protection of each citizen by the combined power of all; which disfranchises traitors and repudiates all obligations contracted in aid of treason and maintains the nation's pledged faith inviolate, and secures to every human being in every State the equal protection of the laws. I read this amendment for the consideration of gentlemen who declare a State not republican which ratifies it:

"ARTICLE XIV.

"SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

"SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

"SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

"SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

"SEC. 5. That Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article."

There stands the amendment ratified by Tennessee, who comes with this new evangel,

"no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Let this provision become the supreme law of every State of the Republic by the omnipotence of the ballot and justice will thereby have achieved a triumph long waited for and prayed for by the oppressed of all lands.

Oh, sir, I am ashamed that a man should stand here and tell me that nothing is done to establish justice when a State lately in rebellion ratifies such a provision as an amendment of the Constitution and conforms its own laws to its requirements. No one who believes that amendment essential to the safety of the Republic, and that it is the highest possible duty he owes to himself and the country to carry that amendment into the Constitution, can stand here and taunt me as having surrendered by its advocacy and the restoration to power of a State which in good faith ratifies it, the rights of loyal colored men or of any men. Without this amendment incorporated in the Constitution of the United States where will you find the power given to the American people to throw the shield of the law of the land over these unfortunate human beings, lately slaves, now emancipated citizens, who with their ancestors have through many generations and many centuries been the victims of cruelty, outrage, oppression, and wrong?

Would gentlemen esteem it nothing if a majority of the loyal people of the other ten States lately in insurrection should imitate the example of Tennessee, declare secession treason, declare slavery abolished and forever prohibited, and solemnly ratify the amendment declaring that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, and Congress shall have power, by the nation's will and the nation's law, to enforce this righteous decree? I pity the man who would not hail such a result with joy and restore at once to their place in the Union States which should give such evidence of respect for the laws and such security for the safety of the Republic. I repeat, sir, that amendment has been indorsed and ratified by that people, a majority of the loyal people of the State, and yet we are told to deny their right to representation until they grant colored suffrage.

I tell gentlemen that the American people will no more tolerate vassal States hereafter in this Republic than vassal men. If the majority of the people of Ohio have the right to control the political power of the State the majority of the loyal people of Tennessee have the same right; and I ask gentlemen to weigh well the question when they come to vote, whether Tennessee shall be rejected only because the majority exercise the same power as to colored suffrage claimed for and exercised by all the other States. Whenever Congress attempts to restrict this right of the majority to rule in the State it will attempt usurpation, and whenever the majority of loyal citizens surrenders that right into the hands of the minority it surrenders the cardinal principle of representative government. One great issue has been finally, and I trust forever, settled in the Republic: the equality of all men before the law. Another issue of equal moment is now pending, and it is this: the equality of the States and the right of the majority of loyal freemen to rule.

That is the issue between the gentleman and myself; it is the whole issue, and I am glad he sees fit to make it. I want to know upon what principle, if you deny the equality of the State, and the right of the loyal majority to rule, we can maintain intact our institutions, secure the just fruits of the triumph of our arms, or escape the reproach of securing to the rebellion itself the fruits of the great victory. I respectfully demand to know upon what principle you can deny the people of Tennessee representation on this floor, without denying the vital spirit of our free institutions, the right of the people to self-government. "Oh," says the gentleman, "we have not reapportioned representation."

Sir, the American people are not going to palter in this supreme moment of trial about small things. They have not seen fit to require reapportionment since the disintegration of the States. Gentlemen know that when the Representatives from Missouri appeared on this floor to be sworn in there had been no new apportionment. And yet, who challenged any of her Representatives on the ground that one half of her people had forfeited their right to representation by treason? Missouri, like Tennessee, had disfranchised rebels and denied suffrage to colored citizens. Yet, who challenged her right to representation here?

Mr. STEVENS. At the time that Missouri elected her Representatives, we had not changed the basis.

Mr. BINGHAM. That does not alter the case; we have not changed the basis yet.

Mr. STEVENS. Missouri was never a rebel State.

Mr. BINGHAM. That does not alter the case, unless it follows that rebels in a State which did not secede are entitled to more consideration than rebels in a State that did secede.

Mr. STEVENS. Nothing alters it, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. The question of being a rebel or a non-rebel State is not involved, because the forfeiture was the forfeiture of personal political rights and not the forfeiture of the equal rights of the State upon restoration. I would like to know upon what principle the gentleman would apply one rule of apportionment to Tennessee and another to Pennsylvania. I suppose the gentleman means by the suggestion, that although Pennsylvania may have had about one hundred and seventy-five thousand as arrant rebels in it as ever followed the standard of Jeff. Davis, they ought to be allowed to have seats in this Congress. I do not say she had that many, but if she had. I am told and believe we had a large number in our western States calling themselves Knights of the Golden Circle, who organized for the purpose of overthrowing the fabric of our Government. I understand that there were some ninety thousand in Ohio, a hundred thousand in the State of Indiana, and a like number in Illinois. If this be so it becomes pertinent to inquire by what logic gentlemen arrive at the conclusion that treason in Tennessee changes the basis of representation, while in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois it does not. There is neither reason nor logic in such a position, with all respect to the gentleman.

I say, again, these States must be equal before the law. They must each have equal representation in the Senate, and they must each be represented according to their whole representative population in this House. It cannot be otherwise until your Constitution be changed. It matters not whether the State may have been hitherto in rebellion or may have been struggling to maintain the Constitution, the rule is the same, and I trust ever will remain, that the States, like the people, are to be equal before the law. That is the position occupied by the friends of this bill. When, sir, did the American Congress ever occupy a prouder or nobler position than in asserting this day in its length and breadth that grand principle out of which your Constitution and Government sprang, namely, the right of the people, faithful to their own great cause, to take the Government into their own keeping and dictate the terms on which it should hereafter go on?

When the clouds hung heavy above us in the first great struggle for American independence, after the foot of the British invader had profaned our soil, and Lexington was red with the blood of our people, and Bunker Hill had shook beneath the shock of the conflict, means were taken, and a confederation was entered into to maintain, by perpetual union and by laws, what was fought for and about to be won by the virtue and valor of the people in arms. By the Articles of Confederation thus entered into it was expressly declared as follows:

"And the Articles of this Confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State, and the Union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterward confirmed by the Legislatures of every State."—Article 13.

Ten years passed; these articles were found, after the peace, insufficient; the fruits achieved by the Revolution were likely to be lost, when Washington, the peerless, and Hamilton, and Jay, publicly declared for a change, an alteration, whether the same should be confirmed by all the States or not. What was the result? Those giant men, the framers of our matchless Constitution, swept away, as though it were a cobweb, the written covenant of the Articles of Confederation, which declared that every one of the thirteen States should be and abide a State of the United States within the Confederation, and that those articles should not be changed without the consent of each State. When asked, "Whence your authority?" the answer of Mr. Madison was, "It is derived from the transcendent law of nature and nature's God, the right of the people to preserve their own nationality and their own liberties." The right of the majority of the whole people to prescribe the new Government essential to their safety they embodied in the Constitution. That provision stands in your Constitution this day "to witness if I lie." This is the provision:

"The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same."—Article 7.

By such ratification the nine States made the Constitution their supreme law, to the utter exclusion of the Articles of Confederation, and notwithstanding the protest of the four remaining States.

The Articles of Confederation went by the board. The Union was organized. Our American nationality was established. Washington took the oath of office in 1789, in New York. The Congress also took the oath and proceeded to legislate. But where were North Carolina and Rhode Island? Out of the Union by their own act, because they refused to assent to the declared will of the majority. It was not for several months after that that Rhode Island and North Carolina were admitted into the Union.

What, then, are we doing now? We have passed through a like struggle. We but follow the example of the fathers of the Republic. It has become apparent that the nation must perish unless the people who saved it put into the fundamental law of the Union a perpetual guarantee for future safety and security. Through their representatives in Congress they have proclaimed these guarantees and sent them forth to the people for ratification by the State Legislatures. These recusant States must ratify them in good faith and conform their constitutions and laws thereto before being recognized by Congress. As in 1789 the Constitution authorized nine States to exclude from the Union any or all of the remaining four States which should refuse to ratify the Constitution, so to-day, in 1866, the Constitution authorizes that great body of freemen who cover the continent, organized into twenty-five loyal States, now represented in this Congress, and represented during the past five years, and who during that long night of peril were under God the saviors of the Republic as they are now the sovereignty of the Republic, to declare that the ratification of this amendment, so essential to the peace and safety of every citizen, shall be first made by a State lately in insurrection before such State shall be admitted to representation and shall have a voice and a power in the councils of the Republic. It only remains, if the insurrectionary States ratify this just amendment, for the loyal States to ratify it.

If the loyal States vote down this amendment it is at an end, and the future of the Republic is enveloped in clouds and darkness, beyond which no human eye can penetrate. If they pass it it will become the supreme law of the land, and in that event no State ought to be represented upon this floor that does not assent to it.

That is the principle upon which this joint resolution stands. Inasmuch as Tennessee has conformed to all our requirements; inasmuch as she has, by a majority of her whole Legislature in each House, ratified the amendment in good faith; inasmuch as she has of her own voluntary will conformed her constitution and laws to the Constitution and laws of the United States; inasmuch as she has by her fundamental law forever prohibited the assumption or payment of the rebel debt, or the enslavement of men; inasmuch as she has by her own constitution declared that rebels shall not exercise any of the political power of the State or vote at elections; and thereby given the American people assurance of her determination to stand by this great measure of security for the future of the Republic, Tennessee is as much entitled to be represented here as any State in the Union. But, sir, what I have said is not all; Tennessee has further entitled herself to be represented by the adherence of her people through good report and evil report to the varying fortunes of the Republic. There is no man upon this floor that has any right to assume for himself a higher or greater measure of patriotism than ought to be accorded to every loyal man in Tennessee. Why not, then, trust Tennessee on the final issue of justice to all, as you must inevitably abide upon that issue the judgment of the people under our Constitution? Let us trust the people of all the States lately in insurrection subject to the condition that in good faith they ratify the constitutional amendment and conform their laws thereto, knowing that if that amendment be made part of the Constitution of the United States the abuse by any State of its reserved powers by a denial of the inherent rights of any portion of the people or of the privileges of any citizen, may be corrected at once by the law of the whole people of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have now said enough to satisfy the House that if Tennessee is not entitled to representation in the House neither is New York or Ohio; if Tennessee is not entitled to representation neither is Massachusetts or Indiana. What then remains to be done but to declare what is recited in this resolution, in the simplest terms, that, whereas the State of Tennessee has ratified in good faith the constitutional amendment and given evidence to the satisfaction of Congress of the return of her people to their allegiance to the Constitution and Government of the United States, therefore said State is hereby declared entitled to representation in Congress by Senators and Representatives, duly elected and qualified, upon their taking the oath required by existing law? By passing this joint resolution you abrogate no principle; no rebel is permitted under this resolution to take a seat in this House; the test oath stands intact. No man is permitted to enter upon the duties of his office here as a Representative from Tennessee who cannot, before God and his country, with a clear conscience, swear that he has not voluntarily aided this unnatural rebellion; this unmatched crime against the life of the Republic.

Is it not clear that it is simply a question whether the loyal men of Tennessee shall be now represented by loyal men, or whether they shall be compelled to wait until the Constitution of the United States is in other respects so changed and modified that Tennessee may be subjected to certain rules of administration which are not imposed upon Massachusetts or Ohio? For myself, while I demand justice for all men, I demand equal rights for all the States. I ask, in behalf of the State of Tennessee, and every other State, that this rule shall be applied: that a majority of the loyal freemen, citizens of the United States, within her limits, shall be permitted to control the destiny and political power of that State, provided they control it in justice and equity. I know not what more gentlemen may ask. My task is done; it is for the members of the House to perform their duty. In much weakness, but in words as earnest as ever issued from human lips, I have called upon the Representatives of the United States of America, here in Congress assembled, to restore to the people of Tennessee those rights which are incapable of annihilation until they are forfeited by crime, or the power of the Republic itself is destroyed by arms.

Mr. BOYER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] by what warrant he said there were one hundred and seventy-five thousand rebels in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BINGHAM. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. BOYER. Then I misunderstood you. Mr. BINGHAM. You certainly did.

The question recurred upon the passage of the resolution and preamble, upon which Mr. J. L. THOMAS had asked for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND. I perceive that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] has some time left. Will he yield to us on this side five minutes of it?

Mr. BINGHAM. I cannot yield.

Mr. MILLER asked and obtained leave to have printed with the debates some remarks he had prepared on this subject. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 125, nays 12, not voting 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Boyer, Bromwell, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburt, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Koontz, Knykenadell, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lynch, Marston, McCullough, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Stevens, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Stephen E. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, Wright, and the Speaker—125.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Benjamin, Boutwell, Eliot, Higby, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Loan, McClurg, Paine, and Williams—12.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Barker, Benham, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Chandler, Cook, Cullum, Culver, Darling, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, Kelso, Le Blond, Longyear, Marshall, Marvin, McIndoe, McKee, Patterson, Pomeroy, Shanklin, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stillwell, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, and Winfield—46.

So the joint resolution and preamble were passed.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. FINCK. Protesting against the preamble, I vote for the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I spit on the preamble, and vote "ay" on the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I vote "ay" for representation.

Mr. LE BLOND. I find myself paired on this question. I am in favor of the resolution, but opposed to the preamble, and therefore I cannot vote at all.

Mr. ROSS. I vote "ay," under protest.

Mr. TRIMBLE. While I utterly repudiate the preamble, I will not hazard the passage of the resolution by voting against it; and therefore I will vote "ay."

Mr. KASSON. I desire to state that Mr. DARLING has been called away by sickness; if he were present he would vote "ay."

Mr. HULBURD. My colleague, Mr. GRISWOLD, is absent. If he were present he would have voted "ay," as he would have done at any time this session.

Mr. COBB. My colleague, Mr. SLOAN, is paired with Mr. HARRIS, but would vote "ay" if he were here.

Mr. NEWELL. I desire to state that Mr. MARVIN is absent by leave of the House. If he were present he would vote "ay."

Mr. DAWES. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. BALDWIN, has been compelled to leave the city on account of sickness.

Mr. MOULTON. I desire to say that two of my colleagues, Messrs. COOK and CULLOM, are absent by leave of the House. If present they would vote "ay."

Mr. MARSHALL. I am in favor of the admission as members of this House of all persons duly qualified, and who can take the oath prescribed by law. But I am opposed to the preamble of this resolution, and therefore I do not vote.

Mr. DEMING. My colleague, Mr. BRANDEGEE, is detained at home by indisposition. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. RADFORD. My colleague, Mr. WINFIELD, is detained at home by sickness. If he were present he would vote "ay."

Mr. EGGLESTON. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. HAYES, is absent on account of sickness. If he were here he would vote for this resolution.

Mr. BROOMALL. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. LONGYEAR, who left the city yesterday. If he were here he would vote for the resolution. I, if I believed what is stated in the preamble, would vote in the affirmative; but as I do not, I would vote "no."

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to announce that my colleagues, Mr. HALE and Mr. DODGE, are absent. If they were present they would vote "ay."

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman from New York, Mr. POMEROY, who is absent, would, if he were here, vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. My colleague, Mr. STILWELL, is paired generally with a member who on this question has voted in the affirmative. I desire to state that if Mr. STILWELL were here he would also vote "ay."

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. HUBBARD, is absent on account of sickness. If present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. My colleague, Mr. GRINNELL, is absent on important business. If he were here, he would vote "ay."

Mr. ORTH. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. DEMONT, is detained from the House by sickness.

When the call of the roll had been concluded, The SPEAKER, directing the Clerk to call his name, voted "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated, and was received with demonstrations of applause on the floor and in the galleries.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HARRIET W. POND.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Claims, submitted, by unanimous consent, an adverse report on the claim of Mrs. Harriet W. Pond; which was laid on the table.

RESTORATION OF INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. STEVENS. I report, from the joint committee on reconstruction, for consideration at the present time, a bill to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights.

The bill was read a first and second time; and the question was on ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read at length, as follows:

Whereas it is expedient that the States lately in insurrection should, at the earliest day consistent with the future peace and safety of the Union, be restored to full participation in all political rights; and whereas the Congress did, by joint resolution, propose for ratification to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, an article in the following words, to wit:

"ARTICLE XIV.

"SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

"SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

"SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

"SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

"SEC. 5. That Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article."

Now, therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the above-recited amendment shall have become a part of the Constitution of the United States, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same, and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted into Congress as such.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the foregoing amendment to the Constitution, any part of the direct tax under the act of August 5, 1861, which may remain due and unpaid in such State, may be assumed and paid by such State; and the payment thereof, upon proper assurances from such State to begin to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, may be postponed for a period not exceeding ten years from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. STEVENS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the gentleman has had his day. [Laughter.]

Mr. LE BLOND. I hope the gentleman does not intend to put this on its passage when it has not been printed and we have not had any opportunity to examine it.

Mr. STEVENS. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 51.

Mr. STEVENS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. STEVENS and Mr. STROUSE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 41, noes 60.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BINGHAM submitted the following substitute for the first section:

That whenever any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified in good faith the above-recited amendment, and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith and with the other provisions of the Constitution of the United States, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, shall, after having taken the oaths of office required by law, be admitted into Congress as such.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman to let me move the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause in the first section of the bill and insert the following:

That whenever the above-recited amendment shall have become part of the Constitution of the United States, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same, and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted into Congress as such: Provided, That if any State, after ratifying said amendment and conforming its constitution and laws therewith, shall establish an equal and just system of suffrage for all male citizens within its jurisdiction who are not less than twenty-one years of age, the Senators and Representatives from such State shall be admitted as aforesaid without being required to await the action of other States on said amendment: And provided further, That nothing in this section contained shall be so construed as to require the disfranchisement of any loyal person who is now entitled to vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. I decline to yield for that purpose. I demand the previous question.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the resolution and the amendment be laid upon the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 101, nays 85, not voting 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. ALLEY, AMES, ANCONA, ANDERSON, JAMES M. ASHLEY, BAKER, BANKS, BIDWELL, BOUTWELL, BOYER, BROOMALL, BUNDY, READER W. CLARKE, COBB, CONKLING, DAVIS, DAWES, DAWSON, DEFREES, DELANO, DEMING, ELDRIDGE, ELIOT, FARNSWORTH, FARQUHAR, FINCK, GARFIELD, GLOSSBRENNER, AARON HARDING, HIGBY, HOGAN, HOLMES, HOOPER, HOTCHKISS, CHESTER D. HUBBARD, JAMES R. HUBBELL, HUMPHREY, JENCKES, JOHNSON, JULIAN, KASSON, KELLEY, KETCHAM, KUYKENDALL, LATHAM, GEORGE V. LAWRENCE, LE BLOND, LYNCH, MARSHALL, MARSTON, MCCULLOUGH, MCKUER, MERCUR, MILLER, MOORHEAD, MORRILL, MORRIS, NEWELL, NIBLEACK, NICHOLSON, NOELL, ORTH, PHELPS, PIKE, PLANTS, RADFORD, SAMUEL J. RANDALL, WILLIAM H. RANDALL, RAYMOND, ALEXANDER H. RICE, JOHN H. RICE, RITTER, ROGERS, ROLLINS, ROSS, ROUSSEAU, SAWYER, SCHENCK, SCOFFIELD, SHANKLIN, SITGREAVES, STEVENS, STROUSE, TABER, TAYLOR, FRANCIS THOMAS, JOHN L. THOMAS, THORNTON, TRIMBLE, TROWBRIDGE, VAN AERNAM, BURT VAN HORN, ROBERT T. VAN HORN, WARD, WARNER, HENRY D. WASHBURN, WILLIAM B. WASHBURN, WELKER, WHALEY, WOODBRIDGE, and WRIGHT—101.

NAYS—Messrs. ALLISON, DELOS R. ASHLEY, BAXTER, BENJAMIN, BINGHAM, BROMWELL, BUCKLAND, SIDNEY CLARKE, DONNELLY, DRIGGS, ECKLEY, EGGLESTON, FERRY, ABNER C. HARDING, ASAHEL W. HUBBARD, JOHN H. HUBBARD, HULBURD, INGERSOLL, KOONTZ, LAFIN, WILLIAM LAWRENCE, LOAN, MOULTON, MYERS, O'NEILL, PAINE, PERHAM, PRICE, SHOLLABARGER, SPALDING, WENTWORTH, WILLIAMS, JAMES F. WILSON, STEPHEN F. WILSON, and WINDOM—35.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. BALDWIN, BARKER, BEAMAN, BERGEN, BLAINE, BLOW, BRANDEGEE, CHANLER, COOK, CULLOM, CULVER, DARLING, DENISON, DIXON, DODGE, DUMONT, GOODYEAR, GRIDER, GRINNELL, GRISWOLD, HALE, HARRIS, HART, HAYES, HENDERSON, HILL, DEMAS HUBBARD, EDWIN N. HUBBELL, JONES, KESLO, KERR, LONGYEAR, MARVIN, McCLURG, McINDOE, McKEE, PATTERSON, POMEROY, SLOAN, SMITH, STARR, STILWELL, THAYER, UPSON, ELIHU B. WASHBURN, and WINFIELD—46.

So the resolution and amendment were laid upon the table.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. STEVENS. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when Congress adjourns on the day of —, instant, it will adjourn to meet again on Saturday the 1st day of December next, unless sooner convened by the President or by the joint call of the Presiding Officers of both Houses, who are hereby authorized to exercise that power in case of emergency.

Mr. FINCK. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated yesterday that he would submit to the House the question whether this was a question of privilege, under the rule authorizing him to do so.

The Chair is confirmed in the correctness of his conclusion yesterday that the resolution is in order as a question of privilege. But it is a very delicate question for him to settle on his own decision, in view of the increased duties and grave responsibilities that may devolve on the Presiding Officers of the two Houses. He therefore submits the question to the House.

Mr. JENCKES. Is it in order to lay the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is not yet before the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand the first question is the question of order. I do not care to debate it, and unless some one else does I will call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The previous question applies to questions of privilege as well as to all others.

Mr. FINCK. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. STEVENS. I intend to allow debate after the previous question is seconded.

The SPEAKER. The previous question would cut off all debate and bring the House to a direct vote upon the question precisely as the Speaker is required to decide it.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I withdraw the previous question, and will hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit one or two considerations on this question of privilege. This resolution contemplates granting power to the Presiding Officers of the House and of the Senate, which is not provided for in the Constitution; a power which we have no authority under the Constitution to grant to those Presiding Officers. The first article of the Constitution, section four, provides that—

"The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day."

Now, I do not deny the power of Congress, by joint resolution, to take a recess; but I deny the right of Congress under the Constitution, either by a resolution or by law, to vest in the Presiding Officers of the two Houses the right to convene Congress at any time. That is a power which is vested in the Executive exclusively. In reference to the powers of the President, in article two, section three, of the Constitution, it is provided that—

"He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them; and in case of disagreement between them with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper."

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is exclusively an executive power. If you can, by a resolution or by a law, vest the authority in Congress or in the Presiding Officers of Congress to call an extra session, then you can strip from the Executive the authority which is vested in him by the Constitution to convene Congress on extraordinary occasions. There is no doubt of the right in Congress to fix the time when it shall assemble. It may by law adjourn till a certain day or take a recess to a certain day; but in the intermediate time there is no power to convene it again except that which is vested in the Executive by the Constitution, and you cannot by law or joint resolution take that power from the Executive.

Mr. DELANO. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. A question of order is now pending, and it is very difficult to make another one.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. When the Chair submits a question of privilege to the House, are not the questions arising out of it proper subjects for the House to determine? The Speaker now undertakes to determine this as a question of order, and yet he has submitted a question of privilege to the House.

The SPEAKER. To what decision does the gentleman allude?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The question raised by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] or which may be raised.

The SPEAKER. As there is a question already pending before the House, submitted by the Chair to the House, it will be very difficult for him to take another point of order.

Mr. DELANO. After the pending question is disposed of, will it then be in order to make another question?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is seconded the House will then vote upon the question of privilege, and if it is decided in the affirmative it will be before the House.

Mr. DELANO. That will not prevent another point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what that point is.

Mr. DELANO. I should be glad to state it. It is this: by a resolution already passed the House has declared its purpose to adjourn on the 25th of July, and a motion to reconsider that resolution was laid on the table. So the House has exhausted its power on that resolution. It is now proposed, I believe, to override that resolution entirely and to provide for a recess, while the former resolution providing for an adjournment is pending in the other branch of Congress. It is proposed that this House shall virtually repeal it by passing a resolution that it will not adjourn at all, but will take a recess. I submit whether this proposition is in order. This is a proposition to take a recess when the House does adjourn. It repeals and overrides the resolution to adjourn.

Mr. STEVENS. I answer that by simply saying that nothing is more common than for this House after voting upon a resolution to adjourn and sending it to the Senate to alter even its own action upon it.

Mr. DELANO. I do not doubt that the gentleman can offer a resolution to rescind, but that is not it.

Mr. STEVENS. This does not propose to rescind, but that on whatever day we do adjourn, even according to the former resolution, we shall adjourn from that day to another.

Mr. DELANO. The resolution which the House has passed was to adjourn, but this which the gentleman offers is not to adjourn, but that when we separate we separate under an agreement to take a recess.

Mr. STEVENS. My resolution is to adjourn from a given day to a given day.

The SPEAKER. If the pending question should be decided to be a question of privilege the Chair would decide the point. But he will overrule it in advance. The House some time since adopted a resolution to adjourn till some blank Thursday in May, and sent it to the Senate. That is a subject for the action of the Senate to be amended and sent back with a different day fixed. If, therefore, in consequence of having adopted a resolution to adjourn on Wednesday, the 25th of July, the House should be precluded from sending another resolution fixing another day for adjournment, then the resolution introduced the other day to adjourn was out of order, because there was a previous resolution pending before the Senate for consideration and amendment.

And the Chair will state that the ruling has always been that these motions in regard to adjournment may be renewed without rescinding previous resolutions. The House can send a resolution to the Senate, and if it is not acted upon they can send another. It is exactly like a motion to adjourn over from Thursday or Friday till Monday, which can be received after other business intervenes. A motion to reconsider and lay on the table does not prevent it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does not this go to the Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. DELANO. I would inquire whether there is not a material difference in the cases. There the Senate have not the House resolution under consideration, here they have. It has been transmitted to that body and they have acted upon it.

The SPEAKER. The resolution of May was sent to them and the resolution of July, so that they have now two resolutions before them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would inquire whether the question of adjournment is any part of the point of order.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. GARFIELD. But really the question is as to giving the Presiding Officers the power to call Congress together. That will narrow down the debate, if the House understands it.

Mr. ORTH. I am decidedly in favor of this resolution. It is apparent to every member upon this floor, as well as to those whom we have the honor to represent, that the duties and responsibilities devolving upon the Thirty-Ninth Congress are of a character and a magnitude equal, ay, superior, to any that ever before devolved upon any other Congress in American history. We are just emerging from a rebellion that has left the social and political fabric of the Government in a most chaotic state. This Congress has been in session for eight long months, and my own individual conviction is that it ought not to adjourn until the next 4th of March, the time fixed by the Constitution for its close. In this I may differ from some of the members upon this floor. I hold this, however, that under the circumstances which now surround us, so portentous that every reflecting mind can see and feel and appreciate them, we ought not to think of an adjournment without holding in our own hands the power of reassembling ourselves whenever any sudden emergency or any great public occasion may require.

Now, as to the power of this Congress to take a recess and provide for the termination of that recess by a call of the Presiding Officers of the two Houses, I have not a particle of doubt. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] says that by this proposed action we would deprive the President of the United States of his constitutional right to convene Congress upon extraordinary occasions. Not at all. No such thing is contemplated by the resolution; no such thing could be done by this Congress. The power of the President, as fixed by the Constitution, we cannot, if we desired, change by our action. And furthermore the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] expressly provides—in which respect I regard it as supererogatory—that the President of the United States, as well as the Presiding Officers of the two Houses of Congress, may in his discretion, whenever the emergency shall arise, convene this Congress at some time preceding the first Saturday of December next. The whole question of adjournment belongs to Congress, subject to the limitations prescribed by the Constitution of the United States. This question is presented in three different aspects:

First, Congress has the power to adjourn sine die at any time during its session by a concurrent vote of the two Houses; and that adjournment is to the time fixed by law for the commencement of the next session, subject only to the constitutional provision which authorizes the President to convene Congress on extraordinary occasions; and also the further provision of the Constitution, that Congress shall meet at least once in each year. Subject to those two provisions of the Constitution, the absolute power of adjournment sine die rests in Congress, and in Congress alone, and is to be exercised without the approval or sanction of the President. And in that connection I will refer members of this House to the third section of the second article of the Constitution.

Mr. ROSS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any objection to leaving the question of the meeting of Congress to the President, in whose hands it was placed by the Constitution.

Mr. ORTH. I prefer to keep it in our own hands. The Constitution has already lodged it in the hands of the President in a certain contingency; and if he sees fit to convene us he can undoubtedly do so. If we see fit to reconvene ourselves we are able to do so without interfering with the prerogative of the President at all. The Constitution provides that Congress shall assemble at least once in each year. Hence a sine die adjournment cannot extend beyond the year; the Congress must be again in session during the year.

In the second place, Congress has the power to adjourn, by the action of both Houses, for more than three days; or thirdly, each House by itself can adjourn for a period less than three days.

Those are the three provisions of adjournment which we find in the Constitution; adjournment sine die by the concurrent action of the two Houses; adjournment for more than three days by the same concurrent action; and adjournment for a period less than three days by the action of either House separately.

Again, no resolution of adjournment needs the sanction of the President to give it efficiency and validity. It is the mere act of the two Houses themselves. I hold, then, that this whole question of adjournment is one that is in the hands of Congress, (wisely so left,) subject only to the two qualifications to which I have already alluded.

I come now to answer the objection made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK,] which is that this matter is left by the Constitution in the hands of the President, and that the grant is absolute and exclusive. Let us see whether it be so. The Constitution provides that the President

"Shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment."

Here is another contingency in which the President may act—

"he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper."

Mr. ROSS. I desire to ask the gentleman one question: if the Presiding Officers of the two Houses should call Congress together, naming one time, and the President of the United States should convene them, naming another time, which call should Congress obey?

Mr. ORTH. Whichever call named the earlier day. Is the gentleman satisfied?

Mr. ROSS. I am not satisfied. Members from Baltimore and other localities near the Capitol would be the first to get intelligence of the call of the President, while members residing near to the Presiding Officers would learn first of their call. Thus some members might get here much earlier than others.

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, this grant of power to the President was given for wise purposes; but although it is an absolute grant it is not an exclusive grant.

Mr. FINCK. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. ORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. FINCK. I desire to say that in addition to the constitutional difficulty, one other point which I endeavored to present as showing that this is not a question of privilege is, that this resolution proposes to confer by legislation additional power upon the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate.

Mr. ORTH. I will answer that point when I finish the position I am now considering. I hold, sir, that this resolution does not come in conflict with the constitutional provision which gives to the President the power to convene Congress, if he sees fit, "on extraordinary occasions." Where the grant is given to the President, as in this case, to do a particular thing, it does not exclude the exercise of a similar power on the part of any other department of this Government, especially in view of the fact that this whole question of adjournment is confided by the Constitution to both Houses of Congress.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. ORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Without being precisely certain on a question so novel as this, I have a very distinct impression about it; and I desire to make a suggestion to my friend that I may hear his reply to it. I do not know that there is anything new in the suggestion which I am about to make. I think that probably it has already been made. It must be conceded as perfectly obvious that the Constitution means to provide for the precise case which is contemplated by the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to wit, the convening of Congress at a time when there is no session of Congress, on account of an extraordinary emergency having arisen. That precise case is provided for by the Constitution; and it is provided that the President of the United States may convene the two Houses, or either of them on account of that emergency. We cannot differ, then, about the proposition that the President has the power; and I do not understand that we do. This proposition is met, however, by the suggestion that the power is not exclusively in the President; that Congress may by an act of its own, either a concurrent or a joint resolution, delegate to some person or persons, other than the President, this power to determine the question of the existence of the exigency calling for the convening of Congress.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, my mind is troubled in taking that view by reason of the general construction arising out of the legal rule and principle that when a power is given in the Constitution to a distinct officer, branch, or part of the Government, unless there are other terms in the instrument which control the matter, the power is exclusive. Take the clause in the Constitution coming below that in regard to the President commissioning the officers of the Government. Does anybody doubt but that is his exclusive power, and that Congress could not by joint resolution or otherwise confer the power on any other person to commission officers of the United States?

Take this case: could we provide by law for a permanent repository of our power for the term of our own lives, or, I should say, for the term of this Congress—could we, I say, give any one person the power to determine whether this Congress should come together and when it should come together before December next? There is no question about the power of Congress to determine its own adjournment; but it seems to me that Congress must take it upon itself to determine whether it will again meet here before next December. If it adjourns, leaving no Congress in session, not having determined the question for itself, then I think that state of case has come where the Constitution provides a repository of the discretion, the exigency having intervened.

I come back to the general proposition that as a general rule, wherever a power is given by the Constitution to any department or officer of the Government, that power is exclusive unless you find something in other portions of the Constitution to control that rule making it exclusive.

Mr. DAWES. Let me put a question to the gentleman from Ohio in aid of the suggestion which he only anticipated me in making.

Mr. ORTH. I will first answer the gentleman from Ohio, and then yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution now offered for adoption is not a resolution of adjournment; it is a resolution that this Congress shall, when it adjourns at some day to be fixed during this month, adjourn until the first Saturday of next December. I submit whether, under the language of the Constitution, the President can call an extra session of Congress when we have taken a recess.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is there not a further provision in the resolution that the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House may convene Congress at some other time? I think the words "session of Congress," employed by the gentleman from Indiana, furnish a hint as to the power of Congress over this question. The Constitution fixes the first Monday in December as the day upon which Congress shall convene. Then it provides they may by law provide for the commencement of the session of Congress. There is another provision in the Constitution that neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days at any one time. The word "session" throws some light on the question. This ex vi termini implies that the two Houses, by concurrent resolution, may during the session of Congress, if it continue to be the same session, adjourn for a longer period than three days, and may, therefore, adjourn from next Thursday to the day fixed in the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It will continue to be the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. The only question remaining, in reference to which I agree with my colleague, is that we cannot depute the power to any other.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose no one will doubt that the two Houses can take a recess to any time we may fix. The only difficulty is that suggested by the gentleman from Ohio in reference to delegating this power to any one else. Admit for the purpose of this argument that they can delegate this power, how can it be done? These two officers have no authority of law to do it.

Now, another objection comes up; they cannot acquire this authority except by law. The question comes up whether by a simple resolution of this House, and of the other branch of Congress, you can clothe these Presiding Officers with new powers. Can you, by a resolution merely, clothe them with any other powers than those which they now have? I do not believe it is within our power to delegate to them any authority over the question of an adjournment. The two bodies of Congress can take a recess for any time that they may fix. The President has the power of convening Congress in extra session; but the two Houses cannot surrender their judgment of the public exigencies to any two members. I have no idea that we can clothe the Presiding Officers of these two bodies with any such power.

Mr. ORTH. I have no difficulty in answering the position taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts; and I need but remind that gentleman of the common transaction in every Congress since the Government was organized of clothing the Speaker of the House with certain authority by simple resolution; and clothing the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate with certain authority by concurrent resolution; and in neither case by law. For instance, we authorize the Speaker of the House to adjourn us when we have agreed upon a day.

Mr. DAWES. Ah, the Constitution says we can do that.

Mr. ORTH. We authorize the Speaker and the President of the Senate to take charge of the public buildings and grounds, the Capitol police, as well as other matters, as the agents of Congress, carrying out their wishes, without any act of Congress on the subject whatever. We do it by resolution simply; and the resolution now under consideration merely empowers the Presiding Officers of the two bodies to carry out the wishes of Congress, and clothes them with authority to shorten the recess from the first Saturday in December to the first Saturday in September for instance; in other words, we take a recess until these gentlemen whom we have appointed notify us that the recess shall terminate. They are to act, not for themselves, but as the agents of the two Houses, carrying out their will and acting under their authority.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Indiana says that this resolution does not contemplate an adjournment but a recess, and therefore the same rules that might apply to a question of adjournment do not apply to this question. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact, if I am not incorrect in my memory, that the word "recess" is not used in the Constitution.

Mr. ORTH. Oh, yes it is.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not mean that it is not used at all, but it is not used in reference to this thing called adjournment. The word "adjournment" is used. It speaks of Congress not adjourning for more than three days. For instance, if we should take what the gentleman calls a recess from now until Wednesday next that is what the Constitution would call, not a recess, but an adjournment. It occurs to me that the gentleman has based his argument on a misapprehension of the facts.

Mr. ORTH. The trouble is that the gentleman from Ohio confounds the terms "adjournment" and "recess." If the House agrees to separate and come together on the first Monday in November, that is not an adjournment.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Constitution calls it so.

Mr. KASSON. The Constitution says that neither House during a session of Congress shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days. I will say that this clause of the Constitution gives me more trouble in regard to the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] in the point of view suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVES,] than any other. His resolution concludes with the words, "who are hereby authorized" to do so and so. That is the language of law. And the two Houses cannot certainly get an enlargement of their powers in this regard except by a change in the Constitution or in the law. There is a distinction between an adjournment by the two Houses and an adjournment to be regulated and determined by two individuals. Can we any more confer this power upon the Presiding Officers of the two Houses than we could upon any two members of the House? Could we move to adjourn until such time as the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Massachusetts should call us together?

Again, can you do this thing by a concurrent resolution? Can you do it except by a law requiring the signature of the President?

Mr. ORTH. With regard to the word "adjournment," the gentleman from Iowa will recollect that the Constitution uses the word "recess" in speaking of the power of the President to fill vacancies occurring during the recess of Congress. What does that mean? When we adjourn for three days, has the President the power to fill vacancies? Does not the provision apply to the entire absence of Congress from these Halls?

Mr. KASSON. I answer that the recess is the time between the adjournment of Congress at one session and its regular meeting at the next.

Mr. ORTH. Then I do not understand that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] takes the position of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that when the House adjourns for three days, it is a recess, but that beyond that time it is an adjournment.

Mr. GARFIELD. According to the Constitution a recess is the time between the two regular sessions of a Congress. From when the first session of a Congress ends to until the time when, under the Constitution, Congress meets again, is known as the recess. But all other intermissions, whether from now until to-morrow, or from now until the day after to-morrow, are adjournments. If I should move that the House adjourn from to-day until Wednesday next, it would be an adjournment, and so, if I should move to adjourn to meet on the first Saturday in December next it would be an adjournment. But if we should authorize the Speaker—

Mr. STEVENS. I think this question has been very thoroughly examined, and I trust we shall not waste further time upon it.

Mr. ORTH. As I hold the floor by the courtesy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] I must decline to yield to further interruption.

I will remark in conclusion that I believe I have said about all I intended to say in answering the various questions that have been suggested by members. I believe we have the power to adjourn or to take a recess, (and those terms are used indifferently in the Constitution) from now until any time in the future, short of the first Monday in December next, when by the law as it now stands we must again assemble, and it is simply proposed to authorize the Presiding Officers of the two Houses to terminate that recess by giving notice to members to reassemble on a given day; to authorize them to do precisely what we can do ourselves; to leave to their discretion, instead of naming it in the resolution, to reassemble Congress when in their opinion an extraordinary occasion or emergency requires it. It is like the power given every session of Congress to the Presiding Officers of the two Houses to adjourn Congress, to take charge of public property, and to do a hundred other things that are done.

Mr. STEVENS. I have but few words to say, and then I hope we will take a vote upon this preliminary question.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. STEVENS. For how long?

Mr. JOHNSON. For two or three minutes only.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well; I will yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to call the attention of the House to one or two points in connection with this question. I first ask the attention of the House to a clause of the Constitution which has already been read; that "Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day." It is to be observed that "unless they shall by law appoint"—what? Some one else to fix the day of meeting? Not at all. There is no authority anywhere in this Constitution for members of Congress who hold delegated powers under a delegated Government to delegate those powers to any other person or persons whatsoever. But there is a clause which says they shall have power to adjourn until the first Monday in the next ensuing December, "unless they shall by law appoint a different day." And that is the only appointment that we have authority to make. It is not the party to fix the day, but the day itself that we are required to appoint.

It is very true that this resolution suggests a day, the first Saturday in December next; and then it makes an exception—unless certain persons shall call Congress together at a different day. Now, I take it that if we have authority to say that the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Presiding Officer of the Senate, whoever those Presiding Officers may be, shall have the power to call us together, then we have the right to say that some man in the city of New York, or in the city of St. Louis, may call us together whenever he may see proper. By authority of the offices which the Speaker of the House and the President pro tempore of the Senate hold, they have no authority under the Constitution to fix the day when Congress shall reassemble. And if they have no such power, then you may as well name John Smith or John Brown to fix that day of meeting as to name any other person. "John Brown still lives," we are told; John Smith is alive, I know. [Laughter.]

The question of a recess or of an adjournment are different propositions; but I will not stop to argue them now. We are wandering from the question. This debate so far has been upon the proposition whether we have the right to pass a law fixing the time when these Presiding Officers shall call us together. We are not proposing to pass a law, because a concurrent resolution is not a law. The question, therefore, comes back to the one before the House, which is, is this resolution a privileged question? If it is, as I argue, a question upon which we have no authority to act at all, then it is not a privileged question. It seems to me clear, sir, that if we have not the authority to adopt this resolution when we get it before the House, then, surely, it is not a question of privilege under the rules, and has no right to take precedence of all other business.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to say but a few words, and then I shall ask a vote on this preliminary question.

In the first place no one doubts that we have the right to fix a future day to which we shall adjourn. In the second place, it cannot, I think, be denied that during this period between the adjournment of Congress and the time which it fixes for reassembling—no matter whether you call it an adjournment or a recess—the power of the President is restricted as it is while Congress is in session. And this is the object which I have in presenting this resolution. I do not pretend to deny it. I do not wish to leave honest men to be the victims of the President's unchecked power during a vacation of Congress.

Now, sir, there being no question as to the power of Congress to name as the period for its reassembling any time which it may think the emergency calls for, have we the right to delegate this power and authorize any one else to judge of the emergency which may require that Congress shall be convened? Sir, the authority of Congress, as of all legislative bodies, is very different from the authority vested in executive officers. When an executive officer has particular powers delegated to him, he is restricted to the exercise of those powers. But a legislative body—this body as well as every other legislative body—has, under the well-known principles of the common law, all the powers necessary for the Legislature of a free Government, whether those powers be enumerated or not, except so far as any power may be expressly denied by some restriction of the organic law. Whatever power, then, is necessary for a legislative body this Congress has it, unless it is expressly prohibited by the organic law. No delegation of power is required. There are certain powers inherent in every legislative body, as much as the right of eminent domain or anything of that kind. This is a principle old and well understood.

In view of this principle, I hold that there is nothing to restrain Congress from authorizing even the Doorkeeper, if they choose, to convene Congress upon an emergency. Mr. Speaker, how unwise and how fatal it would be if we were not vested with this power! There may be times, there are times, when we are in the midst of a revolution, and when the duty devolving upon a particular officer to call Congress together may not be by him exercised—when it may not be for his interests or for the interests of his schemes to have Congress in session. And yet the whole safety of our country may depend upon our assembling here, if a particular emergency should arise. And it is to be said that Congress, adjourning to a given time, cannot provide for this emergency, so imminent—nay, palpable as the sun in the heaven; that we are to prostrate ourselves as helpless victims at the feet of conspirators by saying that no one but the President has power to convene us? We ourselves must fix the organ by which we are to be convened, or, however grave the exigency, we shall never be called together.

Suppose there were a coup d'état. I am supposing what may well happen—what has happened in other countries and made it necessary for legislative bodies to declare themselves in session en permanence. Suppose anything of that kind should happen—I hope it may not, but I dread it—are we to have our hands tied, with nobody able to sound the alarm and call us together? Why, sir, Congress would be a very impotent body if we were in that helpless condition.

Now, sir, I am in favor of conferring this power upon some one in whom we can have confidence. If any better depository can be found for it than that named in my resolution, very well. If gentlemen prefer that this authority should be intrusted to the Chief Justice of the United States I have no objection. That we have the right to fix upon the power to call us together in a time of great emergency and danger to the Commonwealth, I can no more doubt than I can the great law of self-defense which authorizes us to protect ourselves when assailed.

Mr. Speaker, I beg pardon for having spoken so long, and I ask that a vote may now be taken on the preliminary question.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House entertain this resolution as a question of privilege?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. The resolution, if received, will of course be open to amendment unless the previous question shall be demanded.

The SPEAKER. It will.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 62, nays 51, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baxter, Benjamin, Broomall, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Deming, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hubbard, Julian, Kelley, Koontz, Leflin, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, McClurg, McRuer, Morour, Miller, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Price, John H. Rice, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Ward, Warner, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, and Windom—62.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Baker, Banks, Boutwell, Boyer, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Eldridge, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hogan, John H. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Marshall, Moorhead, Morrill, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, and Whaley—51.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Culom, Culver, Darling, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Dumont, Eggleston, Farquhar, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jones, Kelso, Longyear, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, Morris, Newell, Patterson, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Rousseau, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Taylor, Thayer, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—69.

So the resolution was ordered to be received.

Mr. STEVENS. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether his purpose will not be accomplished by striking out all that relates to the power of the President of the Senate and the Speaker of this House to summon Congress together. It will then read that when Congress adjourns at this session—I ask gentlemen to remember the words, for they are the words of the Constitution—it shall adjourn to meet at the time fixed by the gentleman in his resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. We do not propose to adjourn this session at all.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 63, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Baker, Banks, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Eldridge, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Leflin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, and Whaley—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baxter, Benjamin, Boutwell, Broomall, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelley, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McRuer, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Price, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Stevens, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Welker, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—63.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Culom, Culver, Darling, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Dumont, Farquhar, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Jones, Kelso, Longyear, Marvin, McCullough, McIndoe, McKee, Morris, Newell, Patterson, Plants, Pomeroy, John H. Rice, Rousseau, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Thayer, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—51.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. STEVENS. I will hear it read.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I propose to substitute the following:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That when this House adjourns on Wednesday next, July 25, it will take a recess until Saturday, December 1.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask my colleague to strike out the words "take a recess" and insert instead the word "adjourn."

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I have no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. The reason is that the Constitution itself, by express terms, declares that a session of Congress may adjourn for a longer period than three days, with the concurrent consent of the two Houses, and the word recess, by very intendment of the Constitution, applies only to that space of time which passes between the close of one session of Congress and the commencement of another session, or between the termination of one Congress and the commencement of another.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would inquire what authority any one has to say that this House will adjourn. I hope no such resolution will pass.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will modify it by leaving the day blank, so as to read as follows:

That when this House adjourn on the — day of July, it will adjourn to meet on Saturday, December 1.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If the resolution should pass, as modified, would we or not be entitled to mileage?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Each member is entitled to two mileages in one Congress under the law, and that is all.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to further debate.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to allow the amendment to be offered?

Mr. STEVENS. I decline to yield for that purpose.

On seconding the demand for the previous question there were—ayes 37, noes 45; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. STEVENS, and ASHLEY of Ohio.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 38.

So the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND. I demand the yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The question being taken on agreeing to the resolution, it was decided in the negative—yeas 48, nays 75, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Boutwell, Broomall, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Hart, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelley, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, McClurg, Mercur, Miller, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Price, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Stevens, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Welker, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—48.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Bundy, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Eldridge, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Leflin, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, Marston, McIndoe, McRuer, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Paine, Phelps, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Shanklin, Shellbarger, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Wright—75.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Culom, Culver, Darling, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Jones, Kelso, George V. Lawrence, Longyear, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, Patterson, Plants, Pomeroy, Rogers, Rousseau, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stilwell, Thayer, Upson, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and Winfield—59.

So the resolution was disagreed to.

Mr. FINCK moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the Committee on Enrolled Bills had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 246) relating to public schools in the District of Columbia;

An act (S. No. 325) to give certain powers to the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia;

An act (S. No. 178) to incorporate the Metropolitan Mining and Manufacturing Company;

An act (S. No. 277) for the relief of William Cook; and

An act (S. No. 137) to amend the acts approved August 6, 1861, and July 10, 1862, establishing a Metropolitan police in the District of Columbia, to increase the efficiency thereof, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. HUMPHREY and Mr. WARNER.

Mr. BENJAMIN asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. Blow, for the remainder of the session.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 477) further to provide for the safety of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, to regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 692) increasing the pensions of widows and orphans, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed Messrs. LANE, VAN WINKLE, and DAVIS as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 101) for the relief of certain officers of the Army, had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed Messrs. RAMSEY, COWAN, and SPRAGUE as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 159) authorizing the Commissioner of Public Buildings to employ three additional watchmen in the Smithsonian grounds.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. No. 709) entitled "An act for the relief of Mrs. Eleanor C. Ransom," with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 441) entitled "An act for the relief of Margarette Ann Laurie;" in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

JAMES C. COOK.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the bill reported on Friday last from the Committee on Patents (H. R. No. 760) for the relief of James C. Cook, upon which the gentleman from Connecticut demands the previous question.

Mr. RADFORD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend that motion so as to provide that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. That motion would require unanimous consent.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object.

The question was taken on Mr. RADFORD's motion, and it was agreed to.

And thereupon (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. HOLMES: The petition of Henry C. Bolland, for an American register for the Canadian-built schooner Royal Albert.

By Mr. PERHAM: The memorial of clerks in the Patent Office Bureau, asking to be placed on an equal footing in regard to pay with other clerks in the Interior Department.

By Mr. PLANTS: The petition of A. W. McCormick, and others, praying Congress to enact just and equal laws upon the subject of inter-State insurances, &c.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The memorial of L. F. Fix, late lieutenant colonel and aid-de-camp Missouri State militia, praying for relief.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 21, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the petition of Sylvester Mowry, praying for remuneration for losses sustained by him in negotiating drafts on the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York in 1861, while he was United States California boundary commissioner, to protect the honor of the Government; and as there is little prospect that this memorial will be acted upon at the present session, I think it but justice to state, especially as some misrepresentations have obtained currency with regard to the acts of the memorialist, that on an examination by the proper accounting officers he is found to be a creditor instead of a debtor to the Government, and the balance has been paid to him. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a petition of certain members of the first Michigan cavalry, praying that soldiers of that regiment discharged in Utah Territory and not furnished transportation, may be paid their actual traveling expenses home, and a communication from the Governor of Michigan on the same subject, submitted a report accompanied by a joint resolution (S. R. No. 138) for the relief of the first regiment Michigan cavalry. The joint resolution was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 411) fixing the compensation of officers, clerks, messengers, and others in the service of the Senate, reported a bill (S. No. 443) fixing the compensation of officers, clerks, messengers, and others in the service of the Senate and House of Representatives, and for other purposes; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print five thousand extra copies of the report of the Secretary of the Navy on interoceanic railroads and canals, report it with an amendment reducing the number to two thousand five hundred. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That two thousand five hundred additional copies of the report of the Secretary of the Navy on interoceanic railroads and canals, with the accompanying maps, be printed and bound for the use of the Senate.

ALABAMA AND FLORIDA RAILROAD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 134.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 134) extending time to the Alabama and Florida Railroad Company for the payment of duties on railroad iron was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. The object is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to extend a credit of five years to the Alabama and Florida Railroad Company for the duties upon a sufficient quantity of railroad iron and fastenings to relay the track of that railroad from Pensacola, Florida, to the Alabama State line, a distance of thirty-seven miles, the company giving satisfactory security for the payment of the duties within the term of five years, with semi-annual interest thereon at the rate of six per cent. in gold, and the iron and fastenings are to be used for no other purpose until the duties are paid in full.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to amend the joint resolution in line five, after the words "Alabama and Florida Railroad Company," by inserting "of Florida."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That addition will be made, no objection being interposed.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM P. WINGATE.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I move to take up a little joint resolution in relation to the settlement of the accounts of William P. Wingate, collector at the port of Bangor, Maine.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 123) in relation to the settlement of the accounts of William P. Wingate, collector at the port of Bangor, Maine, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It recites that certain goods (molasses and salt) were imported by Fisk & Dale, Josiah Towle, and Morse & Co., and held in bond at the custom-house in Bangor, Maine, on the 2d day of May, 1864, and were on that day released and withdrawn upon payment of the duties imposed thereon prior to the enactment of the joint resolution of April 29, 1864, the collector not then having received official notice of such enactment; that the collector is now charged with fifty per cent. additional to the amount already paid upon those goods, and claims to hold the importers to pay it to him. It is therefore proposed to direct the Secretary of the Treasury in the settlement of the accounts of William P. Wingate, collector at the port of Bangor, Maine, not to exact from him the payment of the additional duty of fifty per cent. imposed by the joint resolution of April 29, 1864, on the merchandise withdrawn for consumption by the parties named on the 2d day of May, 1864, and to order the cancellation of the several bonds given by the importers in those cases.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Upon investigation it is found that the duties were paid after the passage of the resolution of April 29, 1864, increasing them fifty per cent. without exacting the fifty per cent. The Secretary of the Treasury, having authority to release, did not release because the collector had a telegraphic notice that such a resolution had passed; and the collector not being released himself, he held the parties who had paid the duties liable. The Government subsequently restored the old duties upon these articles, and these parties who had obtained the articles had them on hand when the duties were made the same as they were before, and they got no advantage by the advanced duties and were compelled to sell the goods as they would have been if there had been no fifty per cent. advance upon duties. In all other cases of this description the Government has released the parties, and the Finance Committee thought it was equitable that the accounts of the collector at Bangor should be settled by the Secretary of the Treasury, with authority to release the persons whom he held responsible for the additional duties. I think it is equitable and just that it should be done.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST ROUTE BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the amendments to the post route bill that are now pending on the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 775) to establish certain post roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be resumed at the point where it was interrupted on the last day when it was before the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded with the reading of the bill.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads proposed to strike out from line two hundred and thirty-eight to line two hundred and fifty-one, under the head of "Minnesota," as follows:

From Milton via Swan Lake, to Blue Earth City.
From Sauk Centre, via Westport, Lake Amolia, Reno City, Lake Tokua, to Fort Wadsworth.
From Little Falls, via Long Prairie, to Alexandria.
From Saint Peter, via Lake Prairie, Kelso, and Dryden, to New Auburn.

From Shakopee, via Maple Glen, New Dublin, New Market, and Cedar Lake, to Oral.
From Shakopee, via Marystown, Lydia, and Helena, to Oral.

From Winona, via Home, Arcadia, Gilmantown, Mondovia, Landon's, and Eau Claire, to Chippewa Falls.

And to insert the following:

From Shakopee to Excelsior.
From Montville, via Vernon, Waltham, and Mower City, to Austin.
From Buffalo, by Maple Lake, to Fair Haven.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines two hundred and fifty-six, two hundred and fifty-seven, and two hundred and fifty-eight, as follows:

From Milton, via Swan Lake, to Blue Earth.
From Blue Earth City, via Fairmount, Jackson, and Sioux Falls, to Yankton, in Dakota Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines two hundred and sixty to two hundred and sixty-seven, as follows:

From Watertown, via Winstead and Bergen, to Hecoe.

From Hastings, via New Frier and Cannon Falls, to Kenyon.

From Hutchinson, via Cedar, Greenleaf, Kandigohi, and Irving, to Torah.

From Henderson, via Arlington, New Auburn, Witadew Lake, and Fort Wadsworth, in Dakota Territory, to Fort Rice, on Missouri river.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line three hundred and eighty-six, under the head "California," to strike out "from Los Angeles, via Elizabeth Lake and Oak Creek, to Havilan."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment proposed by the committee was after line four hundred and twenty-seven, under the head of "Kansas," to strike out:

From Medina, via Oskaloosa, Winchester, and Easton, to Leavenworth.

From Lawrence, via Oskaloosa, to Grasshopper Falls.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line four hundred and thirty-five to insert "from Wathena, via Columbus, to Iowa City Point."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from lines four hundred and thirty-seven to four hundred and forty-two, under the head "Nevada:"

From Carson City, via Ophir, Washoe City, and Steamboat Springs, to Huffaker's Rancho.

From Virginia City, via Unionville, Star City, Dungen, and Paradise Valley, to Boise City.

From Austin to Cortez.

From Austin to Ione.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to know why they are stricken out.

Mr. RAMSEY. The reason why they are stricken out is that they have been heretofore enacted, some of these routes, two or three times. That is the reason we strike them out of this bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out from line four hundred and forty-four to four hundred and forty-nine:

From Aurora, via Columbus, to Silver Peak.

From Austin, via Kingston, Ophir Canon, Twin River, and San Antonio, to Silver Peak.

From Wellington Station, via Esmeralda, Mammoth, and Ione, to Austin.

Mr. STEWART. Have all those routes been enacted before?

Mr. RAMSEY. All stricken out by the committee have heretofore been made mail routes by previous legislation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out lines four hundred and fifty-four and four hundred and fifty-five, under the head "Nebraska Territory:"

From Plattsmouth to Beatrice.

From Dakota to Columbus.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the heading of "Nebraska," after line four hundred and fifty-seven, to insert the following:

From St. John, Iowa, via De Soto and Fontanelle Nebraska, to Buchanan, Nebraska.

From Brownsville to Table Rock, Nebraska.

From Brownsville to Grant, Nebraska.

From Fremont, via Jalapa, St. Charles, Greenwood, West Point, and Rock Creek, to South Fork of Elkhorn.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee also reported to insert after line three hundred and seventy-three, under the heading of Iowa, the words "from Denison to Ida."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 269) to define the number and regulate the appointment of officers in the Navy, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 230) to amend an act to extend the charter of the Alexandria and Washington railroad, passed March 3, 1863; A bill (H. R. No. 379) to establish in the District of Columbia a Reform School for boys;

A bill (H. R. No. 564) to annul the thirty-fourth section of the declaration of rights of the State of Maryland so far as it applies to the District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 709) for the relief of Mrs. Eleanor C. Ransom.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 236) to authorize and establish certain post roads.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 760) for the relief of James C. Cook, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, on the day of —, at twelve o'clock meridian, adjourn their respective Houses until Tuesday, the 24 day of October, 1866, and that on that day, unless it be then otherwise ordered by the two Houses, they further adjourn their respective Houses until Saturday, the 1st day of December, 1866.

RECOGNITION OF TENNESSEE.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 395. It is the unfinished business. It is a bill relating to the aqueduct bridge of the Alexandria Canal Company over the Potomac river at Georgetown, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to make a report. The morning business is not through, I believe.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let the bill be taken up and then you can make your report.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to taking up the bill. If it is the order of business it will come up at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is before the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state that I desire to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary in reference to Tennessee, and if we cannot get the floor to make reports on important matters of this kind, we certainly can do no business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports were called through, and petitions.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I could not get the floor to present the report after I came into the Senate. If the Senator persists in his motion, I can only leave it to the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Illinois so seldom gets the floor that I will withdraw the motion. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House joint resolution No. 83, declaring Tennessee again entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment; and if it meets the views of the Senate, as this is a matter that ought to be acted upon, I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the resolution at this time. Is it objected to?

Mr. McDougall. I ask that the resolution be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is printed and on Senators' tables. I have reported it back with an amendment.

Mr. McDougall. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? No objection being made the resolution is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (H. R. No. 83) as follows:

A joint resolution declaring Tennessee again entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Whereas the State of Tennessee has in good faith ratified the article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the Legislatures of the several States, and has also shown to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to her due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Tennessee is hereby restored to her former proper, practical relations to the Union, and is again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress, duly elected and qualified, upon their taking the oaths of office required by existing laws.

The amendment of the Judiciary Committee was read. It was to strike out the preamble and resolution, and in lieu thereof to insert:

Whereas in the year 1861, the government of the State of Tennessee was seized upon and taken possession of by persons in hostility to the United States, and the inhabitants of said State in pursuance of an act of Congress were declared to be in a state of insurrection against the United States; and whereas said State government can only be restored to its former political relations in the Union by the consent of the law-making power of the United States; and whereas the people of said State did, on the 22d day of February, 1865, by a large popular vote, adopt and ratify a constitution of government, republican in form, and not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, whereby slavery was abolished and ordinances and laws of secession and debts contracted under the same were declared void; and whereas a State government has been organized under said constitution, which has ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery; also the amendment proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress; and whereas the body of the people of Tennessee have, by a proper spirit of obedience, shown to the satisfaction of Congress the return of said State to due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, &c. That the United States do hereby recognize the government of the State of Tennessee, organized as aforesaid, as the legitimate government of said State, entitled to all the rights of a State government under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senate will not adopt that amendment, but that we shall pass the resolution as it came from the House of Representatives. Indeed, I had hoped that the Committee on the Judiciary would report back the resolution without amendment, and that we should have the matter disposed of to-day. I presume there is nothing in the recitals of the preamble reported by the Committee on the Judiciary than what I have already twice voted for. The most material recital in it that is not contained in the House preamble is that the question of the admission of the rebel States is a question for Congress to determine and must be prescribed by law. The House of Representatives, after quite a contest, have adopted a resolution which does not assert that proposition—a proposition which we have already twice asserted, once in the form of a concurrent resolution, and there is no need of reasserting it again. If we take the resolution as it came from the House the same effect is produced—the admission of Senators and Representatives from Tennessee, on their taking the oath of office.

The assertion of these political dogmas in the resolution can be of no use whatever. We have already asserted them in every form in which it is possible to assert them by concurrent resolution. We know that they cannot receive the sanction of the President; and to insert them will only create delay and postpone the admission of Tennessee. This is a joint resolution, and I presume it is contemplated to send it to the President. Now, it seems to me the committee have so framed their preamble that the President cannot approve it, and the result will be another veto and further delay. On the other hand, the House resolution will accomplish precisely the same result; and the body of the resolution being substantially the same, I trust we shall take a sensible view of the question and accomplish the result we desire by the shortest road, and not reassert in the preamble propositions that will only give rise to a new discussion and new controversy.

This is the view I take. We know what was the action of the House, yesterday. Their proceedings have been published, and I hope we shall take the same view which was taken by the great body of the House. If we take the resolution as sent to us by the House, we assert substantially the same thing in the preamble, without going into unnecessary details and reasserting our right to act upon this question. For these reasons I shall vote against the amendment proposed, and for the resolution as it came from the House, and I hope we shall act on it to-day and thus settle the question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I regret, sir, that the Senator from Ohio cannot agree to the substitute which the Committee on the Judiciary instructed me to report, and that he places his objection to it upon the ground that the Executive will veto it. He says that Congress has twice asserted all that is asserted in the resolution as the committee propose to make it read; and having asserted it before, he is now for giving up his own opinion and that of Congress, and yielding to that of the Executive.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say that, and the Senator ought at least to be fair in stating my propositions.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator did state distinctly as an objection to the amendment that we had asserted it twice, and that the President would veto it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I want to know if that does not amount to an objection to our maintaining the position we have taken, and a surrender of our position because the Executive is opposed to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I so understand it, and I see not how any other legitimate inference could be drawn from the remarks of the Senator. But, sir, it is known that the Executive has asserted authority over this question of reconstruction, and concedes to Congress nothing but the right of passing upon the admission of members, and indeed does not concede that to Congress but to each House separately.

Now, sir, this is a joint resolution which comes from the House of Representatives, and of course must go to the President for his approval; and what is it? It is a "joint resolution declaring Tennessee again entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress." Now I say very frankly to the Senator from Ohio, that I am opposed, decidedly opposed, to adopting a resolution simply confining Congress to the admission of Representatives and Senators. We have jurisdiction over this whole subject, and I am not for adopting a proposition merely declaring that Senators and Representatives may come here—a matter that Congress has nothing to do with so far as the qualification, election, and return of a member is concerned. I agree with what is contended for upon this floor by the friends of the President, that each House must pass separately upon the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members; Congress has nothing to do with that question; but what is it that we are legislating about? It is whether the condition of things in Tennessee, brought about by the rebellion, so dissevered the political relations between the State government of Tennessee and the Government of the United States that it lost representation here, and whether it can have any right to representation or any other right as a State, until we recognize it. Our resolution as we report it is not simply that Tennessee is entitled to Senators and Representatives, but we report that the government organized in Tennessee, under a constitution which was submitted to the popular vote, and ratified, as proclaimed by Andrew Johnson himself, "by a large popular vote," is the legitimate government of the State of Tennessee, entitled, not to representation—we say nothing about representation—but entitled to all the rights belonging to one of the States of this Union. Sir, it is much broader than the House proposition. "Entitled to representation" of course; entitled to the guarantee of a republican form of government; entitled to every right which the State of Ohio or the State of Illinois has; and, of course, among those rights is the right of representation.

Now, sir, at this stage of the proceeding I do not propose to be drawn into any extended remarks; but the preamble of the House resolution simply places the admission of the State of Tennessee upon the fact of its having adopted the constitutional amendment; that is all. Tennessee has done much more than this; she is in a very different position from most of the other southern States. Her constitution, I believe, is the only one of all the constitutions which have been adopted in the rebellious States since the rebellion that was submitted to a popular vote and ratified by the people. Perhaps the same thing may have been done in Arkansas. I am not sure but that there may be one or two other instances.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to ask the Senator at this point whether the preamble which he has introduced here from the Committee on the Judiciary does not in so many words assert that the constitution of the State of Tennessee as it now stands is not only republican in form but conforms to the laws and the Constitution of the United States, notwithstanding the fact that it disfranchises the whole colored population. Is not that the allegation of the preamble?

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is nothing in the preamble about disfranchising the whole colored population.

Mr. BROWN. But there is an allegation that the constitution of the State, as it now stands, is "republican in form."

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. I do not believe in that doctrine, and I cannot vote for that preamble.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am sorry that the Senator from Missouri has placed himself in a position by which he declares that his own State constitution is not a republican one.

Mr. BROWN. I do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then he is not here from a republican State at all!

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; that I may be.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know what business he has here if he is not representing one of the States of this Union having a republican form of government!

Mr. BROWN. We will see about that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Most of us are here under republican forms of government just like this in Tennessee. Nearly every one of us holds his seat under a similar State constitution. This constitution, as appears by a proclamation of Andrew Johnson, military governor of Tennessee, was ratified on the 22d of February, 1865, by a very large popular vote. He states in that proclamation that the amendments which were proposed to the old constitution and to the schedule have been adopted by the people. That fact is recited in this preamble, which is not in the House preamble. It is also recited in the preamble that the State of Tennessee has repudiated the rebel debt, has abolished slavery within the State, has declared the ordinance of secession and laws under it null and void, all of which facts are omitted from the recital in the House preamble; and the resolution itself differs materially from that adopted in the House. The House resolution makes it a point that the State of Tennessee is entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress, duly elected and qualified, on their taking the oath of office required by existing laws. The Committee on the Judiciary preferred to leave that matter with the general declaration that this State government which had been organized in Tennessee was a legitimate State government, entitled to all the rights which belong to a State government in the Union, and then it will be left for each House to determine for itself, when the credentials are presented, upon the right of persons who claim seats to occupy them; and we think it is preferable to the shape which has been adopted by the House of Representatives, and for that reason present it in this form.

I do not propose to enter into any extended remarks at this time, as I said; but I will make one further remark in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, that the President of the United States will necessarily veto this resolution. I do not see how he can. Will the President of the United States object to Congress declaring that this very government, which he has been insisting upon was a legitimate government all the time, is legitimate? That is what we declare in our resolution, that this State government, organized in Tennessee is a legitimate State government, a government which he himself organized a year and a half ago, and entitled to all the rights appertaining to any State government in the Union. Can it be that the Executive can have any objection to our declaring that which he has alleged to be a fact all the time? But the Senator objects that we assert that it is for the law-making power to declare this. I think so; we have declared so; and I am for adhering to the position that Congress has taken upon this subject. I forbear to go into that, because it is an extensive subject which would lead to extended remarks. But it seems to me a proposition as clear of demonstration as any political question can be, that it belongs to the law-making power of this Government to determine whether a government exists in a State that is entitled to be regarded as the legitimate government of that State.

Mr. SHERMAN. The last few remarks made by the Senator from Illinois convince me that he ought to take the same view of this matter that I do. He says that the President will not veto this resolution—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not say he will not veto it; I say I see no reason why he should.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask him, turning the same argument upon him, why reassert for the third time a proposition which the President dissents from, merely to form the pretext of a veto?

Sir, we have happily so far progressed with our business on this difficult question of the admission of the southern States, that we can agree that the State of Tennessee is now restored to her old relations to the Union, that she has now placed her institutions in harmony with the General Government. The President and Congress, I hope, can agree on that simple proposition. The House of Representatives by an almost unanimous vote have agreed upon this formula declaring the fact that Tennessee is entitled to representation here, that Tennessee again is placed in harmony with the General Government. The steps by which this state of affairs has been brought about it is not necessary to recite in the resolution. It is only necessary for us to declare the fact, without going into the controverted propositions through which we have traveled during this whole long session. The fact occurs that the State of Tennessee now stands in a position where by the common consent of all parties she is entitled to representation upon this floor. Her people have voted in favor of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery; they have adopted a State constitution in harmony with our General Government. They are entitled to representation here. We know that some of her representatives are thoroughly loyal men by any test to which we can subject them; that they are waiting to take the oath prescribed by law; that the State has adopted the constitutional amendment; that she has complied with all the conditions you have imposed on her. The fact exists, the simple and palpable fact, that the State of Tennessee is entitled to be represented here by Senators and Representatives. The House of Representatives by an almost unanimous vote has declared that in this formula. There is not a word in this formula to which every Senator cannot agree. I will read it:

Whereas the State of Tennessee has in good faith ratified the article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the Legislatures of the several States—

Mr. McDOUGALL. Allow me to ask a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; I cannot yield.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is about that very thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather not yield. The preamble goes on—and has shown to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to her due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States—

Mr. SUMNER. I think that is contrary to the fact, contrary to the evidence.

Mr. BROWN. So do I.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know my friend from Massachusetts and my friend from Missouri do not think that Tennessee will be in harmony with her relations to the General Government until she allows negroes to vote. We come, then, to that bare and simple proposition, that we must require these States to allow colored persons to vote. Are we prepared to make that issue?

Mr. BROWN. I am prepared.

Mr. SHERMAN. If so, why not put it right in here and say so? That is the manly way. If we want to make the issue that no State shall come back here and have Senators and Representatives until she allows all to vote, without distinction of color, why not make the issue frankly and manfully? But that is not done. We have refused to do it; we now refuse to do it; we do not do it by the proposition of the Judiciary Committee.

The House resolution then goes on to declare "that the State of Tennessee is hereby restored to her former proper practical relations to the Union."

There is the simple proposition, that Tennessee, by the adoption of the constitutional amendment, by her action for the last two or three years, by her adhesion to the Government, by organizing a government (at the head of which is Governor Brownlow) and a Union Legislature, by acquiescing and submitting to every proposition made by us, by sending here Senators and Representatives who it is admitted can take the oath of office and are entitled to hold their seats, shall be so declared entitled. We here declare in a few words that Tennessee has complied with all these terms, and then we say in conclusion that she is entitled to representation. Now, is it worth while for us to encumber this proposition, which everybody can vote for except those who are not willing to give up universal suffrage, by propositions upon which we disagree?

I do not think the Senator from Illinois fairly stated my argument. I have voted with him throughout this session that the question of the condition of these States is a question to be determined by Congress. We have asserted that twice by a concurrent resolution. We asserted it in the organization of the reconstruction committee in so many words. We asserted it still more definitely in the proposition that was passed in March last, and which we all voted for. Now, is it worth while again to insert that assertion into the body of this resolution, as if we still had some doubts about it and were determined to force the President to agree to it? Suppose the President differs from us, as we know he does, is it worth while for us again to reassert that proposition? Will his forced acquiescence in it give it any vitality? We have asserted the power; we have exercised the power; we have this day the power; and I will never surrender it; but I will not force it into his teeth and compel him to acquiesce in the assertion of the power, when he has told us over and over again that he does not think we have it as we assert it. I will exercise it, but I would not thrust it into his teeth by a joint resolution, especially when no practical good can come out of it.

The result at which we seem all to aim is the admission of Tennessee. When the other States come in we can apply the test to them.

All we say in this resolution is that Tennessee is entitled to admission. I can say to Senators that from my correspondence with the people, the people of Ohio particularly—and I think in this my colleague will agree with me—while upon other things there may be differences of opinion, there is a warm, hearty, earnest, unanimous sentiment that we should admit the State of Tennessee to representation before we adjourn. That is their earnest desire, and we can close the controversy to-day by the admission of Tennessee upon the basis proposed by the House of Representatives. If you adopt the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee the resolution must go back to the House; you have perhaps a controversy between the two Houses; you may have a controversy with the President. I do not see any use in the delay, and therefore I am in favor of the adoption of the House proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we shall be permitted to go on with this matter; it is an important question and it ought to be settled at an early day. I move, therefore, to postpone all other business and to proceed with the joint resolution under consideration.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me a word. The Senate will undoubtedly do as they please, but I feel bound to object to that motion. I have got the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] directly on my back, and therefore I cannot consent to anything that will displace the business which has precedence. If the Senate chooses to change it I cannot help it; but I must insist that we proceed with the appropriation bill.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I was going to observe that before this subject was passed by—I supposed, of course, the miscellaneous appropriation bill would be taken up, as it was in order—I propose, with the consent of the Senate, to submit a motion that the amendment be printed. It involves not only a very material change in the preamble, it is a long preamble that is now proposed, but it also proposes a change in the resolution itself; and certainly this is a subject of sufficient gravity to authorize and require that the proposition upon which the Senate is to be divided shall be printed. If the Senator's motion is disposed of I ask the consent of the Senate to submit a motion for the printing of the amendment of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that if the matter goes over the amendment will be printed as a matter of course; it will not require any motion; being the report of a committee it will be printed at any rate. But I trust it will not go over; it is a matter well understood; there are but three or four lines in the resolution and they are printed; they are taken from a printed resolution that was laid upon the table some time ago. Every one can have the printed resolution before him in a moment by sending for that; and striking out a few of the words would correct it to the present resolution.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator, and it is this: the Senator is desirous of declaring by act of Congress that the State of Tennessee is entitled to representation in the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; I do not wish to declare any such thing by act of Congress.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator wishes to declare a proposition which covers that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes; I wish to declare that she is entitled to the rights of a State.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then I submit to the Senator that the sensible and the better mode of accomplishing this object is to say precisely that and let all disputed matter go by the board. If he will propose an amendment simply declaring what he says is the intention of his measure, without carrying us over the field of debatable matter, historical questions, I presume we can dispose of the whole subject within ten minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The appropriation bill, of which the Senator from Maine has charge, is a bill that is always postponed until the last days of the session; it will certainly pass; it is one of those things that always receive attention. Now, this is a matter which has engaged the attention of Congress a great deal of its time since we met in December last; it is a matter that ought to receive early disposition, and I think we had better now that the matter is up, proceed with it and finish it.

I am quite aware, I will say in reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania, that all the time he has been quite willing for each House to take up and act on the credentials of persons claiming to be representatives here from Tennessee and other States; but Congress has not been of that opinion, and I think it necessary, before we take action in reference to representation, to find out whether there is a body in Tennessee entitled to representation at all, or entitled to exercise the rights of a State; and I wish to declare in the resolution the whole ground, that there is a government organized there entitled to all the rights pertaining to any of the State governments in the Union. Of course that would embrace representation; but I prefer saying nothing about representation as one of them. I hope that my motion will prevail, and that we may be permitted to proceed with and finish the matter.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If that motion is agreed to, it will displace the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is not the appropriation bill, but the bill of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] in relation to the Georgetown aqueduct.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know how that came to be so.

Mr. GRIMES. It was done last night.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then a very improper advantage was taken of the evening session.

Mr. HENDERSON. No; it was District of Columbia business; it was legitimately up.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But that was only for the evening session.

Mr. HENDERSON. It was all right.

Mr. JOHNSON. It was all wrong.

Mr. MORRILL. My colleague will see that there was no disposition to take any unfair advantage, for the District Committee were entirely unconscious that the effect of the rule would be to bring up the aqueduct bill this morning.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I presume they will not object to the appropriation bill being restored to its former position.

Mr. MORRILL. If we have got any legitimate advantage of the rule I shall be very glad to hold it if I can.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is so much more important to organize some temperance society or something of that kind in the District of Columbia than to pass a necessary appropriation bill that I suppose I shall have to give way.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not propose to argue it.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator from Maine will consent to go on with the present business and let us finish it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am at the disposition of the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. And I trust we shall come to a vote upon it without much delay. I do not see the importance of printing, as called for by the Senator from Pennsylvania, because there is nothing in the proposition that cannot be easily understood, that is not fully understood. I do not wish to get into a discussion, but to leave this resolution in the charge of the committee that have reported it here, and I hope the Senate will come to a vote on the question. We have all got business, and there is much public business to be done, and if we vote I have no doubt we shall adopt this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to postpone the present and all prior orders in order to continue the consideration of House joint resolution No. 83.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is not unreasonable, when we consider the gravity of this question. He proposes that the resolution on which we are to vote shall be printed that we may have an opportunity to see it with our eyes as well as to hear it with our ears, as it has been read at the desk. I say I think that is not an unreasonable request. I should like also to be able to read it; and it is for that purpose, to give an opportunity of printing it, and also because I think that the business which is in hand and is half finished, an appropriation bill, had better be proceeded with, that I shall vote against the motion to go on with the resolution.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, I do not think it is the right of the Senator having in charge this measure, or his committee, to force action upon the Senate without their having an opportunity to see what the exact measure is. It is true it has been read at the desk; but it has not been printed and laid upon our tables. I have not had an opportunity to examine into what exactly it is. No other Senator has except such of the committee as have been consulted about it. It seems to me to be the right of any Senator, his particular personal right, to have every measure of legislation if he requires it put in form that he can examine it at his desk and understand what it is. Here is a matter of vast importance, involving great principles, involving fundamental questions; and it is insisted upon that we shall vote upon it blind without the opportunity of seeing what it is. If this be legislation in accordance with the republican system, the republics of this period have got very near like the despotisms of the days of Caligula.

Mr. POMEROY. This question we were proceeding with by unanimous consent. I should suppose if any one had any great objection to proceeding, he would have made the objection when the resolution came up. The Chair put the question very plainly whether any one objected; there was no objection, and we proceeded to the consideration of the subject. I conclude that persons who desire to postpone and have the resolution printed would have made the objection at an earlier stage of the proceedings.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 36, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Creswell, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Fessenden, Guthrie, Henderson, McDougall, Morgan, and Sumner—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Dixon, Saulsbury, and Wright—4.

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to the body of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I could not agree in committee with the substitute proposed by the honorable chairman of the committee and adopted by a majority of the committee, for several reasons which it is unnecessary now to assign; it is too late in the day to argue the question which that substitute presents. Nor shall I be able to agree to vote for the preamble to the resolution passed by the House yesterday, and if no one else moves to strike out the preamble, I shall make that motion and vote accordingly; but as I am very anxious to have the State of Tennessee admitted to representation, I shall vote for the resolution whether the preamble is retained or not.

The objection that I have to the particular preamble is one of fact as well as of law. The fact which it alleges is by no means clearly established, in my judgment. It states that "the State of Tennessee has in good faith ratified the article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress." I have seen no evidence of the ratification of that amendment at all, upon which I could judicially rely or morally rely. I have seen nothing or heard of nothing except a telegraphic dispatch purporting to have been sent by Governor Brownlow. Now, whether he sent it we cannot know judicially.

But another thing operates upon my judgment. I am by no means satisfied, relying upon the facts stated in that dispatch, that the amendment has been properly ratified. What is the Legislature of Tennessee? How many it takes to constitute a quorum of that Legislature, whether there was that number present in the hall, how they were brought within the hall, we know nothing about. I have understood—whether it is true or not of course I can have no knowledge—that the two or three members who were brought in by force were kept in the room of the sergeant-at-arms of that body, and that was supposed to be a presence in the room in which the House of Representatives of that State was assembled.

But, notwithstanding that, as I think the State is entitled to be represented, and never have doubted upon that question, and that it was the duty of the Senate to have admitted those who were chosen to represent her in this body, I shall vote for the resolution whether the fact stated in the preamble was true or not. Its truth gives no force, as I think, to the obligation of the Senate to admit the members; its falsehood cannot take from the State the right to be represented by Senators.

Mr. GRIMES. I am sorry to say that I am compelled to differ from the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and shall be constrained to vote against his amendment, and shall vote with great pleasure for the original proposition as it came from the House of Representatives.

I understand that the great point made by the Senator from Illinois is that he desires that there should be a recognition of the authority of Congress over the question as to whether the late rebel States shall be entitled to representation or not. Now, if I understand the language of the House resolution, and I believe that is what is now under consideration, no language could be used that would more satisfactorily convey the implication that this matter does rest with Congress, and is dependent upon our action, than that which has been used by the House of Representatives when they passed this resolution.

"That the State of Tennessee is hereby restored." Restored by what? Restored by this resolution, this resolution of Congress, the joint act of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and of the executive department of Congress.

"That the State of Tennessee is hereby restored to her former proper, practical relations to the Union." I understand that that covers everything. I understand that that expresses the opinion of Congress that Tennessee has a right to exercise all of her functions in every department as an independent sovereign State of the United States, as much so as any other State in the Union.

"And is again entitled to be represented." I suppose these words are unnecessary, as this result would naturally follow from the preceding declaration; but it goes on, "and is again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress, duly elected and qualified, upon their taking the oaths of office required by existing laws." Satisfied, Mr. President, as I am that there is a full recognition of the authority of the legislative power of this Government to control this matter by the adoption of this resolution in the phraseology in which it is framed, I shall have no hesitation in voting for the resolution as it came from the House.

I do not know that the preamble is now under consideration, but I am entirely satisfied with that. It declares that "the State of Tennessee has in good faith ratified the article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the Legislatures of the several States." That article, I believe, includes everything in the original bill that was reported back to the Senate and House of Representatives by the joint committee of the two bodies on reconstruction, the committee of fifteen.

"And has also shown to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to her due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States." I am not going into the question which the Senator from Maryland has alluded to, as to whether the constitutional amendment was properly ratified by the Legislature of the State of Tennessee or not. I am myself satisfied from the information that is before me that she has properly ratified it; and having done so and having shown, according to my judgment, in the language of this resolution, a proper spirit of obedience to the laws by her people and her return to due allegiance to the Government, the laws, and authority of the United States, I am prepared to vote for the resolution as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. WADE. I am in favor of the more specific designation of the reasons given in the preamble reported by the committee that induce us to admit Tennessee. The great question between us and other departments of the Government on this subject has been a matter of debate during the entire session, and it seems to me that when we discriminate between one State and another and admit one State into the Union, it is well to have the reasons for doing so upon the very face of the proceeding, so that every man in this Union who reads it may know precisely the grounds upon which we act in admitting this State while we reject other States. I think that it ought to carry upon the very face of the proceeding to every person the reasons which induce us to do this thing. They are not very lengthy, very prolix, or very cumbersome as a preamble to a bill, and such preambles have always in the history of legislation been thought to be necessary when they were explanatory of the acts of the legislative body. There never was a case more opportune for such a preamble than the present, in my judgment.

Now, sir, I am for admitting this State into the Union, and I am for admitting it for the reasons that are set out in this preamble, specifically and precisely showing what the State has done that entitles her here to be represented, for I utterly dissent from the doctrine of the President, that whenever a Union man may appear from any State, however disloyal the State, he is entitled to be a member of this body. That cannot be so upon any republican principle. The principle of that doctrine is totally opposed to all representative government. What, sir, a loyal man represent a disloyal constituency! He cannot represent them; it is not in the nature of things. You may admit a loyal man upon this floor who happens to be sent here by a disloyal constituency; but it is impossible upon the great principles of representative government that he can represent them. It cannot be done, and the attempt to do it would be anomalous, repugnant to the whole spirit of our institutions and cannot be entertained for a moment.

The people of this State, differing, as the Senator from Illinois has already explained particularly, from every other of the seceded States except one, perhaps, have framed a constitution, not moved thereto from any extraneous source, but the people themselves came together to reinvest their Legislature with powers to legislate. That constitution has been submitted to the people; they have ratified and confirmed it; they have abolished slavery; they have renounced the infernal heresy of secession; they have repudiated the rebel debt; they have conformed their legislation to that of Congress; they have adopted our recent constitutional amendment; and, what is more than all the rest, and what is not recited in this preamble, if I understand it, but is a thing that moves me stronger to the admission of the State than anything else, they have disfranchised their rebels and denied them the privilege of participating in the State government. That is the ark of safety. No State can safely be permitted to come into this Congress with representation until she has disfranchised her rebel community. If they are permitted to participate in her legislation and are the majority in all those States, it is impossible that they can be represented upon this floor either by Union or disunion men. It is not in the nature of things.

This State has done that, and I wish that specification had been in this preamble. I think that nothing she has done commends her to our approbation more clearly than the fact that she has done precisely by her legislation what we are endeavoring to do by one article in our constitutional amendment—provided that no person shall hold any office under this Government who has participated in any way in the rebellion. Tennessee has not only done this, but she has disfranchised them; they cannot participate in the State Legislature; they cannot vote there. I wish that fact had been stated in the preamble, so that when my constituents come to inquire why I voted to admit the State of Tennessee into the Union they may in reading the very law be enabled to see why I did it, and not have to guess at it.

I pay no regard to all that has been said here in relation to the President probably vetoing your bill, for anything he may do, in my judgment, is entirely out of order on this floor. Sir, in olden times it was totally inadmissible in the British Parliament for any member to allude to any opinion that the King might entertain on anything before the body; and much more, sir, ought an American Congress never to permit any member to allude to the opinion that the Executive may have upon any subject under consideration. He has his duty to perform, and we ours; and we have no right whatever under the Constitution to be biased by any opinion that he may entertain on any subject. Therefore, sir, I believe that it is or ought to be out of order to allude to any such thing here. Let the President do what he conceives to be his duty, and let us do ours, without being biased in any way whatever by what it may be supposed he will do.

I hope, sir, that we shall shrink from none of the principles that we have avowed. This preamble is but a very vigorous summary of the principles about which we have been contending all winter; and who is to shrink from them now? Let them all there stand out like the sun at noonday as the doctrines of the party, the doctrines of Congress, the doctrines of the Constitution, and that we hold these doctrines to be sacred, and put them forth as the reason of our action to be seen of all men. I hope we shall adopt it just as it came from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. I regret very much that this preamble has been suggested, not that it takes away anything from the resolution or adds anything to it, but simply because it will be regarded as committing those gentlemen who vote for the resolution to everything that may be said in the preamble. We cannot vote for this preamble without crossing the opinions of a good many of our friends here. That is a very certain fact; and I think that it is totally and wholly unnecessary to force those of us who may disagree to the facts stated in the preamble to vote for it in order to accomplish the end to be desired. I mean the preamble that has been presented by the Committee on the Judiciary. It is a bad system anyhow to undertake to set out any facts in the preamble that you can dispense with. It is better to take the resolution, as was very properly stated by the Senator from Iowa, because it carries within itself everything that we desire to assert. I do not like the preamble that comes from the House. I would prefer that that preamble should be entirely dropped with the exception of that part of it which declares that the people of Tennessee have adopted the amendment of the Constitution which was proposed at the present session of Congress. That is enough, because that will indicate to the people that upon that fact, that Tennessee has adopted that constitutional amendment, we are satisfied to receive her; that is, if we are satisfied upon any facts at all. The resolution itself says:

That the State of Tennessee is hereby restored to her former proper, practical relations to the Union.

If she could be restored without the action of Congress, as has been very properly said, what would be the use of making this declaration?

And is again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress.

If we declare by law that she is entitled now to be represented, the inference of course is that without this act of Congress she would not be so entitled. What is the use of thus expressing it unless that be the fact?

As to the preamble that has been reported by the Judiciary Committee, I do not know the facts stated in it, and therefore I shall not vote that I do know them. It is a mere assertion of facts, and unless I know those facts I shall not vote for them. The first is—

And whereas the people of said State did, on the 22d day of February, 1865, by a large popular vote, adopt and ratify a constitution of government, republican in form and not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee has seen fit to propose this new preamble without giving us a copy of the constitution of Tennessee. I am certain I have not read it; I do not know what that constitution is; and I am called upon, without ever having this preamble printed, to cast an important vote declaring that proposition. I do not know any such thing. My colleague [Mr. Brown] says that he is not prepared to vote that Tennessee has a constitution republican in form. One thing I do know, that the able Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] my colleague, and various others that I can point out in this body, will not vote that the constitution of Tennessee is republican in form, at least since the adoption of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. We understand—I have it from parties interested, from the members of Congress elect from Tennessee who are most urgent in having her admitted—that she excludes the entire negro population everlastingly from the ballot. How can the able Senator from Michigan and the able Senator from Massachusetts, my own colleague, and various others, vote for that proposition? I am astonished that it should be assented to by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] who, in a discussion here a short time ago said that he regarded no constitution as republican in form which excluded from the ballot the negro population. There are perhaps four or five hundred thousand negroes in the State of Tennessee entirely excluded by this constitution; and Congress is called upon to declare that that constitution is republican in form. I am making no objection to it; but why force our friends here who do object to it to vote it?

The Senator from Ohio says that it is very improper to refer to the President. But suppose that the President vetoes this proposition and it is sent back to us; will my colleague vote for it? Will the Senator from Massachusetts vote for it, or will he sustain the President's veto? He will be forced to sustain the veto. Why? Simply in consequence of a statement in the preamble that this constitution is republican in form. Why put our friends in this situation? Is there any necessity for it? I think not; and I sincerely hope that the able Senator who has this resolution in charge will see fit to withdraw so much at least of this preamble as asserts that proposition, because although he and myself may believe that this constitution is republican in form, yet we ought at least concede something to the views and opinions of able and distinguished Senators who think otherwise. Besides, even if I thought this constitution republican in form, I am not prepared to say that it does not in any manner conflict with the laws of the United States. I do not know whether that is so or not.

Again, the preamble declares that by the constitution of Tennessee all "ordinances and laws of secession and debts contracted under the same were declared void." I do not know that fact. I ask the distinguished Senator who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, is he prepared to say that the constitution of Tennessee abolishes all "ordinances and laws of secession and debts contracted under the same?" There was a volume of legislation published by the Tennessee Legislature every year. I do not know whether all of those laws are made void or not. I am not prepared to say whether the people of Tennessee have seen fit to wipe out every vestige of secession, and to draw from their government the virus of opposition to the United States that they indulged in during the late war.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Perhaps I can best answer the Senator from Missouri, if he wishes an answer on this point, by reading a clause of the constitution.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will give way for that purpose, for really I have not seen the constitution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Section five of the new constitution of Tennessee, as adopted, is in these words:

"All laws, ordinances, and resolutions, as well as all acts done in pursuance thereof, under the authority of the usurped State government, under the declared independence of the State of Tennessee, on and after the 6th day of May, 1861, were unconstitutional, null, and void from the beginning: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as to affect any judicial decisions made by the State courts held at times differing from those provided by law prior to May 6, 1861; said judicial decisions being made pursuant to the laws of the State of Tennessee enacted previous to said date, and between parties present in court and litigating their rights."

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose that that even would leave any right growing up under secession laws and ordinances still attaching to the individual.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This does not change it; it is a mere recital.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not ask that it should; but this is a very important declaration for us to be making.

Then there is another declaration here, which is also in the House resolution, that Tennessee "has also shown to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to her due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States." The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] a little more than a year ago, in discussion on this floor, and the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] also stated, as I distinctly remember, that they would not vote for the return of any State into the Union until it was clearly manifest that a majority of the people of that State showed themselves willing to return and obedient to the laws and Constitution of the United States; in other words, loyal. Now, I am very well satisfied that a majority of the people of Tennessee to-day—that is, the original white voters—are not loyal, and have not been since 1861. A large majority of them were disloyal then and are disloyal to-day. And yet the Senator from Ohio desires to assert all these propositions to-day, and insists upon having a vote immediately. He must have them all asserted. I am not prepared to assert them. He says that the people of Tennessee have shown a right spirit by disfranchising the rebels. Have they disfranchised a majority of their people in so doing? Yes; and they have disfranchised all the black people. If they have disfranchised the rebels, they have disfranchised the majority of their white voters, and they have also disfranchised four hundred thousand negroes; and a small minority present themselves here, and we must declare that the body of the people have shown themselves loyal!

Mr. President, I am not resisting this government of Tennessee. I am in favor of admitting Tennessee, and I shall vote for it most willingly; but I will not assert the views stated in this preamble. I have taken the ground, in discussion here, that a minority of the people have a right to representation when they show that they are able to control the politics of the State; and I now insist that such is the fact, that when a majority of the people rebel, the minority have a right to govern according to the laws of the United States. That is my position, I have always entertained it, and I do not see any reason to change it now. But when you ask me to assert that the body of the people of Tennessee are loyal and have shown obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, when in order to govern according to their rules they have excluded four hundred thousand negroes and a majority of their whites, I will do no such thing. I hope, sir, that we shall not insist upon this preamble, but that we shall go back to the preamble adopted by the House, and take only this part of it:

Whereas the State of Tennessee has ratified—

Leaving out the words "in good faith," for I do not know whether they have ratified it in good faith or not. I leave that to themselves—

Whereas the State of Tennessee has ratified the article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the Legislatures of the several States: Therefore, Be it resolved, &c.

I am willing to stop right there. I am unwilling to say that Tennessee has "shown to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to her due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States."

Mr. WILSON. Why not strike out the whole preamble?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am more than anxious to do that. I do not want any preamble, because it adds nothing to the strength of the law. It is a mere assertion of fact, and gives the President of the United States another chance to veto a proposition and have a large body of our most radical friends voting with him. That will unquestionably be the case, and we cannot pass the resolution. We shall have to wait here another ten days in order to hear from him and get Tennessee in. It is proper to allude to that consideration, because he will assert no such fact, and we practically assert it by the resolution without any preamble. Then why have any preamble about it? I regret very much that the House of Representatives insisted upon a preamble; and I regret still more that the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate have thought proper to insist upon a preamble more obnoxious, in my judgment, than the House preamble. If we have to take any, I am willing to accept that of the House, because the people of Tennessee have adopted the constitutional amendment recently sent to them, and I am willing to say, and to leave that inference before the people, that we will admit no State unless it does adopt this amendment; that we will regard that as evidence of their sincerity, and take them in, provided we are willing just at that time to take them in. I am not prepared to say, even if they adopt that constitutional amendment, in all cases, that I would receive them. I will look at the surrounding circumstances and the character of the men they send here. They went out of the Union, and I am in no very great hurry to take them back. They insisted upon killing everybody who opposed their going out, and now many of them are insisting upon taking the life of everybody who opposes their instantaneous return. We can take things certainly as gently as they can. They kept out willingly four or five years, and I am not forced, even within four or five years, to be in great haste to receive them back. I am unwilling, if I do receive one of them, to declare in the preamble a thing that I do not honestly believe. I do not believe some of the facts here stated; I am unwilling to make this declaration; and I hope it will not be insisted upon.

Mr. HOWE. I like several of the suggestions of the Senator from Missouri. I like that one especially in which he repudiates the idea of having a preamble at all, and I propose to move an amendment to the amendment to strike out the preamble. I prefer the resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee to the resolution which came to us from the House. I have not compared the two preambles closely enough to know which I do prefer, but I know to a dead certainty that I would prefer no preamble at all to any preamble that we stand a ghost of a chance of getting drafted and prefixed to the resolution. Your preamble, sir, is a statement of the reasons why you agree to the resolution. We have debated the questions connected with this matter of reconstruction, as it is called, not quite ever since I have been born, but it commenced when I was very young, and I think it ought to be known by this time that we are not likely to agree in our reasons for adopting this or any particular resolution upon that subject.

The practical question is, whether you will recognize the government that exists in Tennessee and reclothe it with the prerogatives of a State or not. That is the practical question; all the rest is theoretical. Now, when we vote for the practical thing; when we vote for the resolution which says that representatives shall be received from Tennessee, it is necessary to stop and haggle and debate until we all agree as to the reasons why we vote for that resolution? I would be willing to do it if it were not very hot and I thought there was any reasonable probability of your all coming to my reasons, but, from my past experience, I do not think you are very likely to come to an agreement with my reasons until the hot weather has passed and the cold weather has come and passed again.

The only reason I have for voting for either of these resolutions, the only inducement I have, springs from the consideration that that local government in Tennessee is in the hands of loyal men, that is, men who are of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States and are disposed to obey the national authorities; not only that that government is in the hands of such men now, but that there is a probability that it will continue in such hands. That is all I want of any government. These are the inducements I have to vote to admit representatives from Tennessee.

I could agree to most of these propositions in the preamble sent to us from the House of Representatives, and in most of those or all of those in the preamble reported to us by the Judiciary Committee. This is what I say: that if they are all true, they not only do not constitute the reason, but they constitute no part of the reason why I vote for the resolution; and I do not want to affirm that they do constitute any part of the reason. It does not seem to me that practical and sensible legislators will stop here now to dispute about the reasons upon which they will pass one or the other of these resolutions.

I said that I preferred the resolution reported here from the Judiciary Committee to the resolution which comes to us from the House. The resolution which comes to us from the House says, "That the State of Tennessee is hereby restored to her former proper, practical relations to the Union," &c. It bears a sort of implication that the State of Tennessee had been floating about in a disorganized, and not only that, but in a wild state, away off somewhere in another sphere. The State of Tennessee has been just where she always was since there was a State of Tennessee. The resolution of the Judiciary Committee proposes to recognize the local government which is organized in Tennessee. That is precisely what we want to do, as it strikes me. The State of Tennessee is just where she has always been. The trouble with Tennessee has been that she has had no government that you could trust. The government which existed there in 1791, and long after 1861, you know was so false, so treacherous, and so traitorous that nobody that pretended to any loyalty would trust that. Your armies scattered that. Then there was another government set up. It was more loyal than that, but a hundred times more feeble. That government which was so false and treacherous was strong, so far as the location was concerned, because it was sustained by the body of the people. The government which was set up subsequent to that was true and entitled to respect, but was feeble because the people of Tennessee did not sustain it. But now I believe that government has got into a position, is so fortified that it can sustain itself. Now recognize it. It has not been recognized before. Nobody could recognize it but Congress. We have affirmed that over and over again. That is the one thing necessary. We not only have affirmed it, but our Presidents, I believe both of them, have affirmed that it was necessary for us to recognize these governments; our courts have asserted that only here rested the authority which could recognize this government. That is the one thing, then, to do; and so I prefer the resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee. But I am so utterly and irreconcilably opposed to either of these preambles, and I am so irreconcilably opposed to the idea of having a preamble at all, that I do hope, first, that the preamble reported by the Judiciary Committee will be stricken out, and then that the resolution reported by them will be adopted as a substitute to that sent to us from the House, and I move that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question first is on an amendment to the resolution. The amendment of the preamble is a subsequent question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, we have so many independent minds in the Senate that it seems nobody can give a reason for voting one way or the other that is satisfactory to anybody else. I avail myself, therefore, of that state of things to give my own reasons.

This proposition to admit the State of Tennessee was originally reported to the House of Representatives from the committee on reconstruction. At that time nothing had been done with regard to passing any constitutional amendment, and it was deemed necessary that certain reasons should be given why we admitted the State of Tennessee, as she stood in an entirely different position from all the other confederate States, in order that it might not be drawn into a precedent for the admission of others, in order that it might not be said, "You admitted Tennessee, and why not admit the others?" There was something very distinct in the condition of Tennessee, because before the downfall of the rebellion she had organized a State government, which was adopted by a large vote of the people, perhaps not by a majority, but by a large popular vote, and had manifested a disposition which denoted loyalty to the Union. It was deemed best to state those facts in order, as I said before, that the admission of Tennessee should not be construed into a precedent for the admission of other States which did not stand in the same relations to the Union that the State of Tennessee did.

I think the amendment proposed by the Judiciary Committee does not very much vary from the preamble of that resolution. They naturally prefer their own phraseology and their own collocation of words; but I think there is no addition of substance except that it states the fact that Tennessee has adopted the constitutional amendment. It does vary somewhat in phraseology. As I drew the original preamble myself, I naturally prefer that, and think it could not be very much improved and has not been very much improved.

But the House has chosen to throw that aside, and to give substantially but one reason; and that is, that the State of Tennessee has adopted the constitutional amendment which was proposed to the several States by this Congress; and it has also added some other words, which I think do not have, in the way they are expressed, any very great meaning, namely:

And has also shown to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to her allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States."

At the time the committee on reconstruction reported a resolution for the admission of Tennessee we also introduced a bill, which there seems to be little chance of getting at this session, providing that whenever the amendment to the Constitution which we have proposed should be adopted and become a part of the Constitution, we would then admit any of these States which were found to be in a condition to be admitted. It was not proposed to admit any one particularly simply because the amendment which was proposed was adopted by it; it was deemed safer to wait until it became a part of the Constitution. Now, sir, this resolution ignores that. It stands substantially on the fact that the State of Tennessee has adopted the amendment to the Constitution proposed by this Congress. I am willing to take it, so far as I am individually concerned, with regard to the State of Tennessee, because there are other reasons, as stated in the former preamble, which operate very decidedly in my mind for the admission of the State of Tennessee. I have been in favor of it from the beginning.

But what I wish to come at is this: I do not wish to pass a preamble which will substantially admit that any State that adopts the constitutional amendment shall be entitled to be represented here before that amendment has been adopted by a sufficient number of States to make it a part of the Constitution. I think this preamble from the House is so weak on those points that it will not stand substantially as a reason for the admission of Tennessee. The State of South Carolina, if it should happen to adopt the constitutional amendment, might claim to be admitted immediately, and I might be unwilling to admit the State of South Carolina until the constitutional amendment had been adopted by a sufficient number of States to make it a part of the Constitution.

Now, therefore, this logic brings me to one of two conclusions. Either amend this preamble and state the reasons which are applicable peculiarly to the State of Tennessee, in order that we may not form a precedent with regard to others; or else strike it out altogether, and let Tennessee stand upon the simple vote of admission, giving no reasons at all, and then everybody will be at liberty to give his own.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say to the Senator that if that should be done it would be made a precedent on the next occasion, and it would be said, "In regard to Tennessee no statement of reasons was required or made." Therefore, I think, it had better be done now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I say we had better do one or the other. Either state the things which are sufficient to distinguish the State of Tennessee from the other States as the ground of your action, or give no reasons at all. That was the idea I meant to convey. I am not satisfied that either of them would be bad. I do not think it necessary to state or give any reasons which should necessarily create embarrassment. There are good reasons enough that can be given which distinguish the State of Tennessee from all others, and about which there can be no sort of dispute, and that do not involve us in any dispute, either at this end of the Capitol or the other, if Senators are disposed to adopt that course.

Nor do I see, with the Senator, that there is any very great difficulty in passing it without, if Senators prefer to pass it without any preamble, because when referred to himself and myself, if it is proposed to admit another State, and it is said to him or to me, "You admitted the State of Tennessee," we can point to the facts and say, "I voted to admit the State of Tennessee, and I did it on account of certain facts existing with regard to the State of Tennessee that do not exist with regard to you," and every man then stands upon his own reasons in relation to the matter. I take it that about everybody now is in favor of admitting Tennessee, and I do not think it worth while to quarrel so much about the details in relation to the matter, if there is such a difference of opinion among gentlemen as to defeat the objects which everybody except my honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. Brown] and, perhaps, my honorable friend from Massachusetts—

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly, I am against it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Who are opposed to it, unless something more can be accomplished. I do not myself agree with them in the position that they take about it, especially as the committee on reconstruction agreed to recommend, and I assented to it, the admission of Tennessee at a previous period of the session. It was not called up and acted upon in the House for reasons I suppose satisfactory to them.

All I desire to say is, that I think it may be done properly without any serious evil in either way; either to state the reasons, leaving out so much as would necessarily be supposed to create embarrassment and difficulty, because the other reasons are sufficient, or to strike out the whole preamble, because I think the preamble of the House is very weak indeed, and only tends to do harm, and simply admit the State without any preamble at all. The language of the resolution is very distinct and clear, and I agree with the Senator from Iowa that it asserts sufficiently the power of Congress over the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the proposed amendment to the resolution?

Mr. HOWE. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is to strike out all of the resolution of the House after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the United States do hereby recognize the government of the State of Tennessee, organized as aforesaid, as the legitimate government of said State, entitled to all the rights of a State government under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. I understand the question is on the adoption of the language just read, and without regard to the preamble which precedes it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Entirely. The preamble will be adjusted afterward, or stricken out, at the will of the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. I want to ask if there may not possibly arise this difficulty: the resolution speaks of the "government organized as aforesaid." The word "aforesaid" refers to what is said in the preamble, does it not?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes.

Mr. HOWE. If, then, the resolution should be adopted and the preamble should be rejected, the resolution would be a little uncertain.

Mr. JOHNSON. We shall have to strike out the word "aforesaid" in that contingency.

Mr. HOWE. If I remember aright, that would not make it explicit. The difficulty is that the resolution is framed upon the idea that it and the preamble are one and the same thing. I do not know how we shall get out of the difficulty, but the difficulty strikes me as just there.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Strike out "aforesaid" and say "as it is," and it will be all right.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will not that all be obviated if a majority be in favor of striking out the preamble, by taking the vote upon that first?

Mr. GRIMES. We cannot do that.

Mr. JOHNSON. We can take the question on the resolution first and change that afterward.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the resolution itself be subject to amendment after we substitute the proposition of the Senator from Illinois for that of the House resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly it will be subject to amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then the present question is simply on substituting the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary for the resolution of the House?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And it does not touch the preamble at all?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not at all.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I only want to say a word on this question. I prefer the language of the resolution recommended by the Judiciary Committee, and if it was an original proposition I should vote for it in preference to the resolution as it came from the House; but it appears to me that the resolution from the House, if adopted, leads to precisely the same result. The resolution recommended by the Judiciary Committee merely states that the State of Tennessee is entitled to all the rights secured by the Constitution to the States of the Union. The resolution of the House says that she is entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress, and that cannot be unless she is also entitled to all the other rights which the Constitution gives; and as I feel very anxious to have the State admitted, I shall vote against the proposed amendment and in favor of the resolution as it came from the House.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I understand this amendment to be a congressional declaration, that the present State government organized in Tennessee, is a legal and valid State government under the Constitution of the United States, and that it declares nothing else; that no conclusion will flow from it with reference to the right of persons elected within the congressional districts of that State or possibly by its Legislature, to seats in the two Houses of Congress. It is, in short, in its present form, an indorsement of the Brownlow State government of Tennessee, which is organized under the most eminent blackguard of the age.

Now, sir, in the form in which it stands, this proposition is, in my judgment, offensive. It may be the more acceptable to some minds. I supposed that the general question that we were to pass upon was, the status or position of Tennessee in the Union of the American States for purposes of representation. The issue is now changed to a decision by Congress upon the validity of an existing State government in Tennessee, but does not deal with the question of representation of the people or government of that State directly. I am very unwilling by any act of mine to declare the validity of that State government as a single and independent proposition, separated, from all others, without a more careful inquiry into the proceedings which have taken place in that State, and into the question of the extent to which the disfranchisement of the citizens of that State has been carried by the existing constitution as adopted and enforced. But this resolution obliges us to pass upon those inquiries and narrows the whole question to them. I understand that it is very doubtful whether a majority of the people of that State have been concerned, actively and really, in the establishment of the existing government. I know how it was formed originally during the war, and I am very clear in my mind as to the view to be taken of it in all its earlier stages.

In February last I had occasion to discuss in this Senate the question of the powers and character of the governments which were established in the insurrectionary States during the war under authority of Mr. Lincoln. I held then and I hold now that those State governments were in their nature local, peculiar, and provisional. I thought that the State governments set up in Arkansas, in Tennessee, in Louisiana, and in Virginia, although legitimate and proper as emanations of the war power of the United States, to be used in connection with military operations and in aid of the military power, were not valid and constitutional State governments of the ordinary kind, and the States in which they were established active members of our confederation of States. That opinion was indorsed in the most solemn manner by this Senate and by the House of Representatives. It was indorsed by the refusal of representation on several occasions to persons claiming to be Senators and Representatives in Congress, and notably in the case of Arkansas, which was fully discussed in this Senate. Why, sir, there were but six votes for the admission of the persons claiming to be Senators from Arkansas, and the persons claiming to be Senators from all the other States in question were either rejected or their cases left undetermined. Then, again, we determined that the elections for President and Vice President of the United States, held under the authority of those military governments, were invalid, and that the electoral votes cast should not be counted in the joint convention of the two Houses assembled under the Constitution to ascertain and declare who were elected President and Vice President of the United States.

I say, then, with reference to all those State governments established during the war, that they were military governments in their very nature. They were essentially such. They were not civil, constitutional governments, such as are known in our own fundamental law, but established and dominated by the war power of this Government. But I thought they were legitimate and proper. Why, sir, when we sent our armies into Mexico, General Scott organized or permitted the organization or continuance of local authorities in the country occupied, to carry on the business of local government and to act in aid of his military authority, or, at all events, in subordination to it. He might have preserved order and carried on local government through the commanders and forces under him; but he chose to allow this to be done by the inhabitants of that country themselves. And so while the rebellion existed and war was waged by us against it, we were at perfect liberty, in conducting war operations in any seceded State, to permit the affairs of civil life to be managed by local authorities chosen by the people who adhered to us, or were submissive to our authority, instead of managing them exclusively by military power directly applied. We called the governments set up State governments; but they were in fact provisional establishments destitute of the elements of permanency and independence. I think, therefore, that I was correct in asserting upon a former occasion that it was absurd to hold that "they were State governments in the ordinary sense of the term, and that the minorities who submitted to them were to be considered the whole people for purposes of representation in Congress and for participation in presidential elections."

But how stands the question since peace has returned? War ended in fact more than a year ago, and the entire suppression of the rebellion was officially announced by the President in his proclamation of 2d of April of the present year. In some of the States the so-called "loyal governments" set up during the war continue; but remarkable changes have taken place in their character and action. Constitutional conventions, in which the whole people or a majority of the people participated, have given them a full popular sanction and imparted to them additional validity, or there has been such popular acquiescence in their exercise of authority that they may be accepted as truly representing the people of the States in which they are established.

Now, these governments "ask recognition from Congress as real and complete State governments for all purposes whatsoever. It clearly follows, from what I have said, that the argument in their favor must be placed upon grounds which did not exist during the war. Actual independence of military control, and the acquiescence of the people of the States interested, must clearly appear to justify the full admission of their claims. However imperfect they may have been as State governments originally, however local and provisional in character and subservient to military domination formerly, they may become complete and acceptable State governments by the act or acquiescence of the people concerned, the military power formerly exercised over them being withdrawn. In this view, neither irregularity of origin nor an imperfect constitution in their earlier stages need prevent their present recognition."

Now, sir, what would be interesting, if we went into the inquiry—and we must go into it if we vote upon this amendment now pending—would be to ascertain the extent to which the people of Tennessee have acquiesced since the close of the war in this government which was set up during the war and controlled until the conclusion of the war by military power. Why, sir, the other day, I understand, the Governor of Tennessee called upon General Thomas for military aid in civil affairs in that State—a common thing during the war and then responded to promptly by our military commanders; but by an order from the War Department that aid was refused. It is now understood that that government there is no longer subject to military control or domination. Our public authorities say so. They refuse to interfere in civil affairs in that State, at least to the extent demanded in the requisition to which I have alluded. But, sir, to what extent have the people of Tennessee acquiesced in this government set up over them? I am, I confess, without adequate information upon that very interesting and very vital point. I should like to obtain from the chairman of the Committee upon the Judiciary or from some other source, information as to the number of votes that have been given by the people of Tennessee upon organizing and conducting this State government which we are asked to indorse, and as to the proportion of the population of that State which now not only acknowledges the jurisdiction of this State government, but is authorized by it to participate in its authority and to enjoy fully the elective franchise and other privileges under it.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very few moments on this subject. If I understand the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, his first objection is that the resolution as it now stands and that we are voting upon is simply a recognition of the present government, which he says was organized under "the most eminent blackguard of the age." The government of Tennessee was organized in what way? Under the proclamation of President Lincoln.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I beg leave to correct the Senator. I expressly spoke of it as it stands organized at this date. I had no reference to its origin or first establishment during the war.

Mr. LANE. Then it was in the past tense. This Government was organized under the proclamation of President Lincoln. Andrew Johnson, the present President of the United States, was appointed provisional governor. He issued his call for a convention in the State of Tennessee. A convention was called, a constitution adopted, and an election ordered, and, under that election, William G. Brownlow appears first upon the stage of action in Tennessee. The whole organization of the government was perfect up to the time of his election. He was elected, so far as I know, upon a fair vote of the loyal people of Tennessee. The government then was organized by President Lincoln and by the provisional governor, now the President of the United States.

Whether Governor Brownlow may be "the most eminent blackguard of the age" or not, I am not now here to say. I admit that the telegram that he sent the other day to the Secretary of the Senate was rather more forcible than classical; but compared with other emanations from East Tennessee, I think it is wonderfully respectable, for there is a species of coarseness that seems to run through all the communications from that part of Tennessee.

It is quite as genteel, I think, as the 22d of February speech. The only objectionable part of it seems to be a reflex or echo from that 22d of February speech.

But, Mr. President, a word as to the resolution itself. I shall vote for this preamble and resolution precisely as they came from the House. I think the purpose is as well expressed as we can express it by any change. I am prepared to vote for the resolution without any preamble, or with either preamble, or with both preambles. We are asked to do a certain thing. The doing of that thing is the important matter, and not the reason which we shall assign to ourselves or others for the act. The preamble from the House is in these words:

Whereas the State of Tennessee has, in good faith, ratified the article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the Legislatures of the several States, and has also shown to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to her due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States: Therefore, Be it resolved, That her relations are resumed, and she is entitled to representation.

That is the whole substance of it. Now, if by the people of Tennessee, in this preamble, you mean the loyal people, then I doubt not it is true. If you mean by a "proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people" to allude to the loyal people, then, I doubt not, that is true.

But, sir, what is the difference between these two preambles? The preamble prepared by the Judiciary Committee and presented here is simply fuller in its recitation of the historical facts and connections of this subject than the preamble of the House; but the preamble of the House asserts to all intents and purposes that they have substantially complied with our plan of reconstruction, and are now entitled to representation and to resume their relations with the United States, and as substantially declares that as does the preamble of the Judiciary Committee. Now, sir, when we are all prepared, with two exceptions, I think, in the whole Senate, to admit Tennessee to representation, and to admit that she is in such relations to the Government as to be entitled to resume representation in this body, how childish is it to stand here to debate as to the reasons we shall assign for that act!

Neither of these preambles contain the reasons why I shall give this vote. I shall vote to admit Tennessee because she had, under the proclamation of the President, by the voluntary act of the people, long before the suppression of the rebellion, a full and complete loyal State government. I shall vote to admit her, also, for the causes recited in the preamble. If I understand the plan of reconstruction, it was this: that the constitutional amendment should be adopted by all the States before they should be entitled to representation, with the exception of Tennessee, and in her case she should be admitted to representation when she ratified and confirmed the amendment. Having complied, then, with our own condition, and that fact being sufficiently recited in the House resolution, I shall vote against all amendments and shall vote for the preamble and resolution precisely as they came from the House. If that shall fail, I shall vote for the amendment of the Judiciary Committee. If that shall fail, and both preambles are stricken out, I shall still do the thing I intend to do substantially, by voting for the resolution.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have with some hesitation decided to vote for the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, because I think it nearer right. The resolution of the House assumes that the State of Tennessee is out of the Union, because it proposes to restore her to her "former proper, practical relations to the Union." The resolution proposed by the Senator from Illinois, from the Committee on the Judiciary, simply recognizes the State of Tennessee as in the Union. I think that the State of Tennessee, in the eye of the law, has never been out of the Union; and I prefer to vote for the resolution that recognizes her as in the Union, rather than for a resolution that proposes to restore her to the Union; and it is upon that ground that I vote for the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting in line three, after the word "the" and before the word "government," the word "present," and in line four, by striking out the words "organized as aforesaid;" so that the resolution will read:

That the United States do hereby recognize the present government of the State of Tennessee as the legitimate government of said State, entitled to all the rights of a State government under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that there is any objection to that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary will not be adopted; and my reason is very much unlike the one given by the Senator from Indiana. I think that the resolution, as it was passed by the House, is more in conformity with the heretofore expressed judgment of Congress than the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. The House resolution proposes to restore Tennessee to her "proper practical relations to the Union," while the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary simply "recognizes" the present State government. I understand that it has been assumed by Congress that the proper practical relations of Tennessee with the Union have either been suspended or destroyed by the rebellion, and that it is necessary by an act of Congress to restore those relations; and I think that any act providing for the admission or the recognition of Tennessee should proceed distinctly upon that ground, and that it should not abandon the position which we have heretofore assumed.

Then, again, the House resolution provides that now by this act Tennessee has become entitled to representation in Congress; assuming, of course, that heretofore the State of Tennessee has not been entitled to her representation in Congress. I understand that has been the position of Congress; that whatever might be the legal status of the State of Tennessee, which has been a controverted question, she has not, in consequence of the rebellion which has occurred, been entitled to representation in Congress, and could not be entitled and would not be entitled until Congress had so declared. The House, in this resolution, declare that she is now, by virtue of this act, entitled to representation. I think that this resolution which comes from the House is altogether more in accordance with the views and opinions that have obtained in Congress than the resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee; for that resolution, if I understand it—it is not before me—amounts to nothing more than a recognition of the existing State government in Tennessee, and does not refer particularly to the position of that State. For these reasons I prefer the resolution as it comes from the House.

As to the preamble, I am quite indifferent on that subject. So long as the act is accomplished I think the preamble is quite immaterial; but as the House have adopted a preamble and a resolution, and as there can be nothing gained, as it seems to me, by a mere change of phraseology by the Senate, I shall of course support the resolution as it comes from the House. I think it accomplishes everything that we seek to accomplish; and without some good reason I do not see why a controversy should arise between the Senate and House on this subject.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont, as I understand it, is simply by way of perfecting the form of the resolution as proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, and I hope that the sense of the Senate will be taken on that before the question comes up on substituting the one resolution for the other.

Mr. BROWN. That has been accepted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Has it been accepted?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I cannot accept it; but I have no objection to it. It does not alter the amendment of the committee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It does not alter the fact. It simply provides that the resolution shall stand by itself if we fail to adopt the preamble. The resolution will then be a perfect resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the object of offering the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment as amended, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will ask that the two propositions be read, first the one and then the other of the resolutions, just as they stand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, as amended, will first be read, and then the resolution of the House.

The Secretary read the amendment, as amended, as follows:

Strike out after the resolving clause, and insert: That the United States do hereby recognize the present government of the State of Tennessee as the legitimate government of said State, and entitled to all the rights of a State government under the Constitution of the United States.

Several SENATORS. Now, let the resolution of the House be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

That the State of Tennessee is hereby restored to her former proper, practical relations to the Union, and is again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress, duly elected and qualified, upon their taking the oaths of office required by existing laws.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK (when Mr. CRAGIN's name was called) said: I desire to say that my colleague is sick and confined to his room; otherwise he would vote on this occasion.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Cresswell, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Guthrie, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Yates—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Cowan, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Sherman, Sumner, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Dixon, McDougall, Saulsbury, and Wright—5.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I now move to strike out the preamble from the resolution, if it is in order.

Mr. BROWN. The preamble has not yet been adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to amend the preamble, which is first in order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What is the amendment proposed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read at the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the preamble of the House resolution, in these words:

Whereas the State of Tennessee has in good faith ratified the article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the Legislatures of the several States, and has also shown to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to her due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States: Therefore.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Whereas in the year 1861 the government of the State of Tennessee was seized upon and taken possession of by persons in hostility to the United States, and the inhabitants of said State, in pursuance of an act of Congress, were declared to be in a State of insurrection against the United States; and whereas said State government can only be restored to its former political relations in the Union by the consent of the law-making power of the United States; and whereas the people of said State did on the 22d day of February, 1865, by a large popular vote, adopt and ratify a constitution of government republican in form and not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, whereby slavery was abolished and all ordinances and laws of secession and debts contracted under the same were declared void; and whereas a State government has been organized under said constitution which has ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery, also the amendment proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress; and whereas the body of the people have by a proper spirit of obedience shown to the satisfaction of Congress the return of said State to due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States: Therefore.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Is that question capable of division?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to put this question: suppose a majority of the Senate vote "no," they will thereby refuse to adopt this preamble, but what will become of the preamble sent to us from the House?

Mr. CLARK. You can strike that out afterward.

Mr. HOWE. Will that be adopted, or will the question then recur on adopting that preamble?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on adopting that preamble.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not believe in either of the preambles. I do not vote that the State of Tennessee is entitled to representation in this body for any one of the reasons assigned in either preamble. I believe that the State of Tennessee is entitled to representation because she is a State of the Union, and because the Constitution of the United States very plainly declares that each State in the Union is entitled to two Senators and at least one Representative. I do not believe that she is entitled to a representation in Congress because she has agreed to an amendment of the Constitution of the United States; I do not believe that she is entitled to a representation in Congress for the extraordinary reason given by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] that she has disfranchised more than one half of her people; but simply because she is a State of the Union, and peace being restored, and a condition of obedience to the laws having returned, she, under the plain letter of the Constitution, is entitled to representation. If she is not a State, she is not entitled to representation because she has amended the Constitution of the United States. If she is not a State she is not entitled to representation because she has attempted to disfranchise more than one half of her people. But if she is a State she is entitled because she is a State, and the Constitution declares her right in the legislative department of the Government.

Mr. President, let us consider for one moment the reasons assigned in the preamble presented by the Senator from Illinois. In the first place, it is recited that the State government of Tennessee was usurped by parties hostile to this Government, and that before the close of the war there was the adoption of a constitution in the State of Tennessee. It is then recited that a year ago or more the State of Tennessee ratified an amendment of the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery. That is given as a reason why we recognize her position in the Union. Why, sir, the very reason that is given here why we recognize her position in the Union is a reason why she was in the Union at that time. I ask Senators if the State of Tennessee could ratify an amendment to the Constitution of the United States unless she was a State in the Union, unless she was a State with practical relations to the Union? Can a State out of the Union, can a State in a condition in which she could exercise none of her political powers, amend the Constitution of the United States? And here is given as a reason a fact which could not exist unless Tennessee was a State in the Union, with all the powers possessed by any State.

Then, again, it is averred that very recently she agreed to amend the Constitution of the United States in another respect. If she did that, it was because she was a State, because she was a State of the Union, because she was a State of the Union under the Constitution, and could exercise power under the Constitution. I ask Senators the question, can a State exercise the power to amend the Constitution of the United States—a power conferred upon the State by the Constitution—and at the same time not select Senators and Representatives of right? It is not a question of favor that States are represented in Congress; it is a question of constitutional right. It is because she is a State that she can consent to an amendment of the Constitution. It is because she is a State that she is entitled to representation. And if, of her own free will, and at her own pleasure, she ratifies an amendment to the Constitution, she can at the same time select Senators to represent her in this body, and when they come with proper credentials, qualified to take their seats, of right she is entitled to be represented here.

But, Mr. President, I object to this last reason that is given on another ground. We do not know whether the State of Tennessee has ratified the recent amendment or not. Independently of this resolution, would Senators to-day pass a joint resolution declaring that the constitutional amendment has been ratified by Tennessee? Would any Senator, upon an independent, naked proposition of that sort, cast his vote declaring that that constitutional amendment has been ratified by Tennessee, simply upon a telegraphic message from the Governor of the State? I care nothing about the form of the communication; it is wholly immaterial except as it may illustrate the character of the man. He communicates by telegraph not to the Senate, not to the House, not to the President, but to some person in the city of Washington; Governor Brownlow communicates the fact by telegraph that the constitutional amendment is ratified. Are Senators willing to pass a resolution declaring that fact upon such information, when it is known to all of us that it is disputed, when it is known to all of us that there was not a quorum present, and that to make up a quorum it was necessary that there should be present in the legislative body two men who were in confinement in another part of the Capitol? When that is claimed, and when we have no information communicated to any branch of the Government, can we undertake to declare that the constitutional amendment has been ratified? Is it the business of Congress to declare the ratification of a constitutional amendment? I do not understand that it has ever been done. It is a question of fact whether a State in proper form has ratified a constitutional amendment. Usually, I believe, the information is communicated to the Secretary of State, and he makes it known to the country by a proclamation; but that is simply for information. The courts, I presume, would, ex officio, take notice of a ratification. But it is a question of fact whether the Legislature of Tennessee has ratified that amendment.

Now, I ask Senators if we have sufficient information on this subject to justify the declaration that it is ratified. We are all ready to vote Tennessee in. I desired to do it months since, and I am ready to admit all the States that have sent here Senators qualified and duly elected. I am ready to vote for that resolution, although I think it objectionable, because it accomplishes that end. I desire Senators from Tennessee to participate in our deliberations when we are legislating in regard to the interests of the people of Tennessee. For that reason I am ready to vote for the resolution, however objectionable in form it may be.

Then, I ask Senators if they ought to ask us to vote for a preamble which we do not believe, in fact; to vote for reasons that we believe neither logical nor true. You want Tennessee to come in. Is it right, then, to compel us who differ from you to vote for a political stump speech in advance of the resolution? A few years ago you found great fault in regard to a bill that was passed establishing territorial governments in Nebraska and Kansas, and you said a political stump speech was injected into the bill; or at least it was said by Mr. Benton, and repeated everywhere, and it was considered wrong. But here you introduce a resolution by a political stump speech, which is neither true in fact nor logic, in my judgment.

We do not admit, and I do not think any Senator here will say that he admits, Senators to this floor on the ground that the legislation of the State has been agreeable to him. The legislation in Indiana is not agreeable to the majority in this body. We have excluded a portion of the people from immigration into our State; and that was in the constitution of Indiana when I took my seat here. Did any Senator ask the question whether the legislation of Indiana was agreeable to him? By no means. Then is any Senator here prepared to say that he admits a Senator to his seat simply because the action of the Legislature is agreeable to him? The reason that you admit a Senator here is because the Constitution says that his State is entitled to two Senators; and there is no other reason that can be given. It is simply a question of fact whether a State is in the Union, and if in the Union, whether she has, in proper form and by the proper authorities, selected Senators; and if so, they are entitled to their seats.

Then, I appeal to Senators not to force upon us a preamble which we cannot believe. If you believe this preamble, make it in your stump speeches before the country. It is not just to the minority to force upon us a preamble which we do not believe. We are ready to support the resolution and let Tennessee come in. If she is entitled to representation, declare so. I think that each House ought to declare this for itself; but I shall not stand upon a question of form. I am ready to vote for the resolution, and let the Senators and Representatives from Tennessee take their seats.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I am very glad to agree with my colleague in the opinion that it is unnecessary that we should have any preamble at all to this resolution. There are reasons sufficient to vote for the resolution. The members of the Senate may not agree altogether in those reasons, if we attempt to state them in a preamble. I remember very well a remark once made by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] not long after I became a member of this body. He had had already considerable experience here as well as elsewhere. It was a remark which struck me with great force then and which I have always remembered, and upon which I have sought sometimes to profit. It was this, that sometimes persons in entering the Senate, who were new here, were too anxious to explain every vote they happened to give; and said he to me, "Let them give their vote; they can explain it afterward." Now, sir, there are some who are ready to recognize the government of Tennessee because they believe it is republican in form. There are other Senators here who state, and who conscientiously believe, that its government is not republican in form, and therefore they cannot vote for the preamble. There are other Senators who believe that Tennessee ought to be admitted because it has adopted a certain constitutional amendment. There are other Senators who would not make the adoption of a constitutional amendment a condition precedent to any State being entitled to representation in Congress. There are other Senators who, like the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. LANE,] believe that the State of Tennessee, by its people, during the rebellion, organized itself into a loyal State government; that that State government was born of the people by their own act and not born of Congress at all; that it is not in the power of Congress to give birth to a State government; Congress can recognize a State government, it does not create it.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate, for I am anxious to get on with business, but there are different reasons operating upon different minds in the Senate, and yet all concur in one thing. What is that? That Tennessee is a State and has an organized State government, and is entitled to representation. That is all we want to say. I want to say it. I will say it to-day; I would say it to-morrow; I will say it at any time. I would have said it any time for the last six months, but there were others who could not conscientiously do it. I do not stand here to find fault with them, but I say, inasmuch as Senators differ in the reasons which bring their judgments to the common result in which we all agree, to wit, that Tennessee is now to be recognized and is now entitled to representation; for whichever of these reasons, let us declare the result and let each Senator have his own reasons—it is because she has adopted the amendment to the Constitution, or because she was organized, as my friend from Indiana believes, by her loyal people and has been properly in operation for years in spite of the rebellion. Whatever may be the reason, we all agree in the one thing: that we recognize that she is a State organized in the Union, entitled to her rights as a State in the Union. Let us say precisely what we intend to say: that she is so entitled, and then there is no difficulty, no controversy among ourselves; no controversy between Congress and the President, or anybody else. When we all agree in the thing, but may not agree as to the reasons for doing it, why not do it, and not quarrel about the reasons? I hope, sir, that this preamble business may be laid aside. I agree with my colleague that we should leave out the preamble.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] objected very strenuously to that portion of the preamble reported by the Committee on the Judiciary which reads as follows:

And whereas the body of the people have, by a proper spirit of obedience, shown to the satisfaction of Congress, the return of said State to due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States.

That recital is copied in hæc verba from the House preamble. Of course it is just as objectionable in the House preamble as in the one reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. Our report is an amendment of the House report, and those words are the same in both. They would not have been inserted, probably, as an original proposition. I thought there was force in the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri, and I have no objection myself to those words going out. I think it would be as well, perhaps, to let them go out, and instead of saying that "the body of the people have, by a proper spirit of obedience, shown to the satisfaction of Congress, the return of said State to due allegiance," to say simply that the State of Tennessee has done other acts proclaiming and denoting loyalty. That there could be no objection to.

While I am up I desire to say that I am not tenacious about a preamble at all. I introduced a proposition, when we first heard that Tennessee had ratified the constitutional amendment, without any preamble. I would have been satisfied to act without having any preamble; but the House thought proper to adopt a preamble, which was sent to the Senate. The matter was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I felt very sure of one thing: that if we had a preamble at all it ought to be full; we should either have no preamble, and let every person, as was said by the Senator from Wisconsin, vote for reasons satisfactory to himself, one way or the other, or, if you had a preamble, it should be full.

Now, what is the difference between these preambles? The Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] preferred the House preamble. The reason I object to the House preamble, if we are to have one at all, is that it is not full; it contains but one declaration; and what is that? That Tennessee has in good faith ratified the constitutional amendment proposed at the present session. That is all there is in it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. No.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is all there is in it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. "And has also shown to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to her due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States."

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is nothing specific. That is a sort of "general welfare" clause that does not amount to anything. The only specific statement is the one in regard to the adoption of the constitutional amendment. If we adhere to that preamble and pass a resolution declaring the existing government in Tennessee to be the legitimate government of the State, and entitled to all the rights belonging to a State in the Union, as a matter of course we commit ourselves to admit South Carolina to-morrow if she does the same thing—what? If she ratifies the constitutional amendment. I am not prepared to do that. I think if we have a preamble at all, we should have one showing the distinction between Tennessee and the other States. As the Senator from Maine has stated, the committee on reconstruction reported a preamble stating that difference, and when this subject was before the Committee on the Judiciary this morning, we had that preamble before us. The condition of things has changed somewhat since that report was made, and we altered it, preserving all that is in it, I think, and adding something that has since transpired. The Senator from Maine thinks we have not improved the language at all. I doubt if we have. Very probably his was better. In draughting a thing of this kind where you have to change it, different persons will adopt different language; but it is substantially what the committee of fifteen reported, with the addition that Tennessee has ratified the constitutional amendment, which is contained in the House proposition.

Now, if we are to have a preamble at all, it seems to me it had best be full; and the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary which has now been substituted for the House resolution, makes it necessary to adopt a preamble in order to express the views entertained by Congress. I was not particular about any preamble, as I say, but I really think we had best not adopt the House preamble. I shall not object to striking out those words which the Senator from Missouri thought very objectionable. They are in both preambles, and I would be quite willing that they should go out, although I have no authority to modify the amendment which I have submitted, the preamble coming from a committee. I am willing to strike out those words which state what the body of the people of Tennessee have done. I do not think them essential. I think they were not in the report of the reconstruction committee, but they were in the House preamble, and as there was no disposition to depart from the phraseology of the House preamble unless something was to be gained by it, I saw no special objection to them, and they were adopted. However, I do not wish, certainly, to retain them if a single Senator objects to their being there, and no one thinks it important to have them there. So much upon that point.

The difference between the preambles is this: the one reported by the Judiciary Committee is fuller than the other. It not only recites the fact that the constitutional amendment has been adopted, but it also recites the fact that the State of Tennessee adopted a constitution which was submitted to the people and received a large popular vote. It recites the fact that the constitution of Tennessee abolished slavery, repudiated the rebel debt, repudiated the rebel laws and the rebel ordinance of secession and whatever was done under it, which, I think, are important recitals; and the condition of Tennessee is different from most of the other States in the fact that her constitution was submitted to a vote of the people. If we are to have a preamble at all, I really think that the preamble reported by the Committee on the Judiciary is fuller and had better be adopted; and now, it seems to me, there is a necessity for a preamble if we take the Senate resolution as it has been adopted by the committee.

I wish to say further to the Senator from Oregon that the House resolution goes entirely on the question of representation. For one, I wish to repudiate that. That is the very point that has been insisted upon in this Chamber by those who advocate what is known as the President's policy. It is insisted that Congress has nothing in the world to do with these rebel States except to pass, in each House, upon the qualifications and elections of members. The House resolution goes upon that idea. Its title is, "A joint resolution declaring Tennessee again entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress." I do not want to make any such declaration as that. I want to declare that there is a constituency entitled to all the rights of a State. Of course, that embraces representation in Congress, but I deny that the Executive has any more power to determine what is the government of a State in reference to other matters than he has in reference to the right to seats in this body. I do not wish to limit it; I would not say anything about representation in this resolution that we are about to pass; but after this resolution passes, and it is declared that there is a government entitled to all the rights of a State government, then, of course, whenever any person comes here claiming to be a Senator, or to the other House claiming to be a Representative from that government, the only question is, has he been elected, is he qualified, and is he qualified to take his seat? And that each House passes upon. I would leave that to each House. I do not think that the Congress of the United States, as a Congress, that the law-making power, ought to be saying anything about representation. I do not think that as a Congress we have any right to determine who is entitled to sit in one House or the other; and it is in reference to that, in reference to representation, that this joint resolution is framed.

What we want to determine is, whether there is any government there entitled to exercise the rights of a government, and embraced among them would be the right of representation, and that is decided upon; that is, the admission of members by each House. It is for that reason that I like the form of the Senate resolution best; and if we are to have a preamble at all we had better have a full one; and if we are to adopt the Senate resolution, a preamble is absolutely necessary to go along with it, and to show the precise position of Congress. I think the declaration with which this preamble sets out is very important:

Whereas in the year 1861 the government of the State of Tennessee was seized upon and taken possession of by persons in hostility to the United States, and the inhabitants of said State, in pursuance of an act of Congress, were declared to be in a state of insurrection against the United States; and whereas said State government can only be restored to its former political relations in the Union by the consent of the law-making power of the United States.

I think that is a very important recital. It is a point which was always insisted upon most strenuously by the Senator from Vermont, whose loss we have all so much deplored this session, the late Mr. Collamer. He always insisted that the inhabitants of these States having been declared to be in a state of insurrection by virtue of an act of Congress, they could only be restored to their practical relations to the Government by virtue of an act of Congress; that as they had gone out in that way, they must come back into their political relations by the permission of the law-making power. As they had chosen by violence to dissolve their relations and set up a hostile government, and Congress had passed a law under which they were declared in rebellion, therefore, whenever the time had come that they could resume their rights, it must be by the permission of the Government.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. I would agree with him, and I would agree with the late Senator from Vermont, that the facts recited there were very good reasons why we should not have passed such a resolution as this in 1861, 1862, or 1863; but I do not see how they constitute a good reason why we should pass the resolution now. There are entirely different facts which induce me to vote for it now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, sir, I think if the position is a good one, that they can only be restored to their practical relations by the law-making power, if that was a tenable position assumed by the Senator from Vermont, it is just as good to-day as it was in 1861. I cannot see why a principle which in 1861 forbade any representation from any State except by virtue of an act of Congress is not a good principle in 1866. That is the principle laid down by the Senator from Vermont. I trust, therefore, that this preamble will be substituted for the House preamble for the reasons which I have stated.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the question, as I understand it, is between two preambles, which of the two to choose. I agree with my friend from Illinois that the preamble reported by him in many respects has the advantage of the preamble which is sent to us from the House. It is fuller, and in its structure it is better. I am glad that it has undertaken to set forth how Tennessee lost her representation here, and also to set forth how she may again, or has been again if so it may be, rehabilitated. I am glad to see all that in the preamble. But while I accord merit to the Senator's preamble in that respect, there are other particulars in which I think it fails. He himself has already recognized that in one particular his preamble is no better than that of the House. It is in this particular: that it sets forth that the State of Tennessee—

Has also shown to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to her due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States.

In those words the two preambles are alike; there is no advantage in one over the other; but I understand the Senator from Illinois is willing to alter those words in his preamble. If he does consent to that alteration, and the alteration is made, then, in that respect I shall recognize his preamble as superior to that of the House. Clearly, sir, that assumption is false; Tennessee has not "shown to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to her due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States." Perhaps I go too far when I say that it is false, that she has not shown it to the satisfaction of Congress, because if Congress votes that, it will not be for me or for any one else to say that Congress has voted a falsehood; but I do say that Tennessee has not shown "a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people." I say all the evidence that thickens in the air from that State, and has been darkening our sky during all this winter, shows that Tennessee has not that spirit of obedience in the body of her people. Why, sir, only this winter the other House has been constrained to send a commission to Tennessee in order to investigate an outrage of unparalleled atrocity growing out of this very rebel spirit. How can the Senate of the United States undertake to aver that the body of that people, thus saturated with the spirit of disloyalty, thus set on fire and inflamed by this sort of hatred to the Union, have shown to the satisfaction of Congress a proper spirit of obedience? Sir, you make a mistake if you put in your statute-book any such assertion which is historically untrue. You cannot make it true by your averment. History hereafter, when it takes up its avenging pen, will record the falsehood to your shame.

Sir, I have here on my table, sent to my desk since this discussion came on, some of the evidence laid before the reconstruction committee. In this evidence there is a good deal relating to Tennessee. Among the papers is a statement or memorial from German citizens there. I think, from reading this memorial, it is entitled to peculiar credit. I shall not read it, but I shall call your attention to a few sentences. I read as follows:

"In short your memorialists anticipate that at the first general election the entire civil and judicial power of the State must pass into the hands of those who have so long oppressed them and made actual war upon them. The judicial election, which is the most important of all, must soon occur."

Then it goes on in another place:

"The predominant feeling of those lately in rebellion is that of deep-seated hatred, amounting in many cases to a spirit of revenge toward the white Unionists of the State, and a haughty contempt for the negro whom they cannot treat as a freeman. The hatred for the white loyalist is intensified by the accusation that he deserted the South in her extremity, and is, therefore, a traitor, and by the setting up a government of the minority."

Then, in another place, these petitioners say as follows:

"A party exists in the State, which is every day becoming more and more compact and powerful, which sympathizes with the men and principles of the rebellion. It commands every agency to operate upon public opinion. It has five well-sustained and ably-edited daily papers in Memphis, four in Nashville, one in Knoxville, and a weekly in each of the important villages. Their pardoned but talented and still popular leaders are with them. Hundreds of rebel ministers who glory in having led off in the rebellion, and who have been, throughout the war, the bloodiest-minded men in the South, are still in the confidence of their people. All these appliances acting in harmony mold public sentiment as they please, and command a party of over two thirds of the white men of the State. Free from restrictions upon suffrage, they will probably cast ninety thousand votes in the State."

Sir, there is testimony that has been presented to your committee, and published by the order of the Senate as a part of their report.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator permit me to say a word?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. GRIMES. I happened to be chairman of the sub-committee that took the testimony in the case of Tennessee; and it is due to that committee and due to the people of Tennessee to say that while that memorial from which the Senator has read was sent to the committee without the sanction of an oath, and at my instance was caused to be published in that report, yet the current of the whole testimony which is in the book before the Senator goes to show that there was a growing spirit of loyalty: that there was a large proportion, some sixty thousand voters of the State of Tennessee, who were loyal; and that the military and civil officers with one accord expressed the opinion that it would advance the interest of the loyal men of Tennessee to allow that State to be represented. The statement which the Senator reads comes from gentlemen who were unknown to the committee—a mere memorial without the sanction of an oath.

Mr. SUMNER. Let me show to the Senator that he entirely misapprehends what I was about to say. I adduce this memorial in order to show that there is not a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people. I do not now enter into the argument whether that spirit would be increased by the admission of her members on this floor or not. I know very well the testimony of the generals on that subject. While they recognize the bad condition of things in Tennessee to such an extent that they all testify that it was unsafe to release it from military power, they did undertake to say "but by the admission of her representatives on this floor a spirit of order and peace would be promoted there. I make no question as to their testimony. I am simply speaking of the actual condition of things in Tennessee as appears by the testimony offered to this committee."

Mr. GRIMES. That was the testimony not only of the generals, but it was the testimony of every civilian, I believe, who was examined before the committee.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; admit that it was the testimony of generals and civilians. That does not go to the question whether we in the preamble to our resolution should aver that there is proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people. There is no general that says there is a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people. I challenge the Senator from Iowa to point to the testimony here that shows there is a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people. Generals testify that in their opinion it would be better to admit representatives from Tennessee on this floor and the floor of the other House. That is another question. I have not come to that question yet. The Senator springs from his seat and interposes that question. Logically, it is not before me at this moment. I am merely speaking of the erroneous character of this preamble which avers a proper spirit of obedience in the body of the people of Tennessee; and I was going to say in support of that I adduce this testimony. Now, I understand that the Senator from Illinois is willing to alter his preamble in that particular. I believe I am right, am I not?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; I am willing those words should go out.

Mr. SUMNER. I think, sir, they ought to go out, and if they do go out, it will make his preamble in that respect superior to the preamble of the House.

That carries me now to another part of the preamble of the Senator. He has another allegation there which I must say is as erroneous as the one on which I have now remarked. He there declares, and calls upon us to declare, that the constitution adopted by Tennessee is republican in form. A constitution which disfranchises more than one quarter of its population, republican in form! What, sir, is a republican form of government? It is a government founded on the people and the consent of the governed. Sir, that constitution of Tennessee is not founded on the consent of the governed. It cannot invoke for it that principle of the Declaration of Independence; it is not a government republican in form; and when you undertake to allege that it is republican in form, permit me to say you make an allegation which is false in fact. I do not intend to raise any question of theory, but I submit to the Senate that a constitution which on its face disfranchises more than one fourth of the citizens cannot be republican in form. You, sir, will make a great mistake if at this moment of your history you undertake to recognize it as such. You will inflict a blow upon republican institutions. I hope that the Senator from Illinois as he has consented to one amendment of the preamble will now consent to another, that he will strike out those words declaring that this constitution is republican in form and in harmony with the Constitution of the United States. Do not compel us to aver what hereafter history will look at with scorn. Who can doubt when the history of all this war comes to be written gravely and calmly in the tranquility of the future that the historian must bring all these events to the rigid test of principle? Bringing them to this test, it will be impossible to recognize any government, like that of Tennessee now, either as republican in form or in harmony with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As I indicated, I will move to strike out of the preamble the words "and whereas the body of the people of Tennessee have by a proper spirit of obedience shown to the satisfaction of Congress the return of said State to due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States," and in lieu thereof to insert "and has done other acts proclaiming and denoting loyalty." This will make it more satisfactory to some Senators.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the words to which I referred a moment ago, coming after the word "constitution," namely, "republican in form and not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States," be struck out. I want to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Illinois if I can.

Mr. WILSON. I hope those words will be stricken out.

Mr. WADE. I want to hear how it will read with those words stricken out.

The SECRETARY. That clause of the preamble if amended will read:

And whereas the people of said State on the 22d day of February, 1865, by a large popular vote adopted and ratified a constitution of government whereby slavery was abolished and all ordinances of secession and debts contracted under the same were declared void.

Mr. SUMNER. That is right.

Mr. COWAN. I have a single remark to make. I am opposed to preambles, particularly those which cannot be agreed upon by all parties who are in favor of the substance of the bill. I think the purpose of a preamble is entirely mistaken. The function of a preamble is not to state the reasons which influence men to vote, but it was anciently used in statutes (very much disused now) to describe the mischief which was intended to be remedied by the statute, and therefore usually could be agreed upon if the statute could be agreed upon. But I do not think that any legislative body ever split upon the preamble after they had passed the resolution or the enactment which followed it, because to suppose that they could was to suppose that there was an irreconcilable difference between the two; and that is why the rule in legislative bodies has been to pass the enactment first and then to adopt the preamble afterward, merely for the purpose of helping the judiciary afterward in their construction of the law. It sometimes happened that a law, from the general nature of its terms, would have been very much enlarged if it had not been for the preamble which described the exact mischief intended to be corrected by it.

I have another objection to preambles, preambles particularly which cite dubious facts and which attempt to compel people to vote for that which is asserted as a fact when they do not believe it. It is a very stale trick of the politician, and I think ought to be discouraged. I remember very well in old times, when I had the honor, and not only the honor, but the great pleasure, to be a member of the Whig party, during the time of the Mexican war, we thought our Democratic brethren were oftentimes very unkind when they prefaced their bills and resolutions with "whereas war exists by the act of Mexico," or "whereas we are waging a just war with Mexico," and all that kind of thing; and if you did not swallow the preamble you could not vote for the bill.

Now, as I do not conceive that any advantage can be gotten from these things, I hope that these preambles will be dispensed with and let us get at the subject in hand, which I understand to be the admission of representatives from Tennessee. If we are agreed upon that point I cannot see any reason in the world why we should differ about the ornamental parts of the bill, or about the phrase in which it is couched. The great matter is to get at the thing you desire to achieve.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would ask my friend from Pennsylvania if the Democrats ever yielded to his demands and gave up the preambles.

Mr. COWAN. I do not know that they did; but if they did not, I would advise my friend from Ohio not to imitate a bad example, but rather to yield now, and I trust he and his friends will do so.

Mr. YATES. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be adopted, if for no other reason, for the sake of principle. Some gentlemen on this floor believe that no constitution is republican in form which excludes from suffrage all of a particular class of individuals.

Mr. COWAN. Say who they are.

Mr. YATES. Negroes. Others believe that it is republican in form. As these words are not necessary to the preamble at all, and give it no more force whatever, I think they should be stricken out without affecting the proposition, and I sincerely hope that the amendment will prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] to the amendment of the Judiciary Committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

PENSIONS OF WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I ask leave at this time to present a report from a committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report can be received if there be no objection; the Chair hears none.

Mr. VAN WINKLE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 692) increasing the pensions of widows and orphans, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendments, namely, insert the following new sections:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any person, during the pendency of his application for an invalid pension, but after the completion of the proof showing his right thereto, has died or shall hereafter die, but not in either case by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the service of the United States and in the line of duty, his widow, or if he left no widow, or in the event of her death or marriage, his relatives in the same order in which they would have received a pension if they had been thereunto entitled under existing laws on account of the service and death in the line of duty of such person, shall have the right to demand and receive the accrued pension to which he would have been entitled had the certificate issued before his death; and in all cases where such person so entitled to an invalid pension has died, or shall hereafter die, under the circumstances hereinbefore mentioned, either by reason of a wound received, or disease contracted in the service of the United States and in the line of duty, or otherwise, without leaving a widow or such relatives, then such accrued pension shall be paid to the executor or administrator of such person in like manner and effect as if such pension were so much assets belonging to the estate of the deceased at the time of his death.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the repeal by the act entitled "An act supplemental to the several acts relating to pensions," approved June 6, 1866, of parts of certain acts mentioned in the first section of said act shall not work a forfeiture of any rights accrued under or granted by such parts of such acts so repealed, but such rights shall be recognized and allowed in the same manner and to all intents and purposes as if said act had never passed, except that the invalid pensioner shall be entitled to draw from and after the taking effect of said act, the increased pension thereby granted in lieu of that granted by such parts of such acts so repealed.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That nothing in the fourth section of the act entitled "An act supplemental to the several acts relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1865, or in any other supplementary or amendatory acts relating to pensions, shall be so construed as to impair the right of a widow whose claim for a pension was pending at the date of her remarriage, to the pension to which she would otherwise be entitled had her deceased husband left no minor child or children under the age of sixteen years.

RECOGNITION OF TENNESSEE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 83) declaring Tennessee again entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress, the question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to the preamble.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to make one inquiry with regard to this preamble. The preamble carefully sets forth that under the authority of an act of Congress the State of Tennessee was declared to be in a state of insurrection. I suppose allusion is made to the proclamation of the late President issued in pursuance of an act passed early in the war. Now, sir, I should like to know why the preamble omits a very important circumstance connected with that which occurred on the 2d of April last, to wit, that the President of the United States, in obedience to an act of Congress, or by virtue of authority conferred upon him by an act of Congress, declared that the insurrection against the authority of the United States had ended and that a state of peace was restored throughout the United States with the exception, I think, of Texas. That would be a statement preliminary to the resolution. It would follow in natural and logical order after the statement which the Senator from Illinois has inserted regarding the former proclamation of the President declaring the insurrection in existence. I inquire of him, then, why he omits the second proclamation, issued by virtue of the same authority, declaring that insurrection to be ended. It is by reason of this omission of the Senator from Illinois or of his committee to take notice of that second proclamation and of the important consequences in the argument to be derived from the fact of its existence that they get the conclusion which they appear to draw in the preamble; that an act of Congress is necessary to restore this State to its constitutional relations with the Federal Government.

In the preamble it is stated that the State of Tennessee was declared to be in a state of insurrection in pursuance of an act of Congress. Then the committee proceed to state the logical conclusion which they draw from that fact, which is that an act of Congress is necessary to reinstate the State of Tennessee in her former position in the Union. The committee are enabled only to draw that conclusion, which is the point of objection with many members to this preamble, because the proclamation announcing the termination of the insurrection was omitted in the statement. If that were placed in the preamble following the statement of the original proclamation, the logical absurdity would be so patent upon the face of this preamble that I presume neither the Senator from Illinois, who reports it, nor any member of the Senate who is disposed to vote for it, would entertain it for one moment.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to call the attention of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, if he will allow me to do so, to the fact that there is no statute authorizing the President to issue a proclamation announcing that the insurrection has ceased in any of the States. Congress might have inserted such a clause undoubtedly if it had seen fit; but there is an absence of any such statutory provision as would give to the President authority to declare the insurrection at an end, or in other words to declare that peace was restored. Congress undoubtedly proceeded upon this principle, that it is the war-making and war-conducting power, and that alone, which can recognize or reestablish the state of peace after a state of war has intervened. So that in this case it was not necessary in any point of view to recite the fact that the President had issued his so-called peace proclamation; and I have ever regarded that proclamation so far as it assumes to declare that peace with all its concomitants has been restored, as utterly destitute of any statutory provision to stand upon or any rule of the laws of war.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I take it for granted, for the very brief purpose in view, it is competent for me to assume that the proclamation of the President issued upon the 2d of April is a valid document, issued by virtue of due authority conferred upon him by the laws of the United States. I do not propose now to go into the argument of that question, as I appear to be invited to do by the observations of the Senator from Michigan. I am very confident that upon examining the statutes passed upon this subject this authority will be found to be contained in them. The original authority to the President itself I believe was subject to this condition, that they should be declared to be in insurrection so long as the insurrection should continue. The implication upon that language would be clear and manifest, and would point in the direction which I mentioned before.

I say I rose to call attention to this very important omission in the statements of the preamble, by which alone, as I understand, the conclusion of the committee is logically reached or can be inferred that an act of Congress is necessary to restore this State to its constitutional relations to this Government.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, as this is a question between the two preambles, I have no hesitation in saying that the amplest and fullest is the one which commends itself to my judgment, and the one which upon ordinary principles of legislation can alone, it seems to me, be adopted. If it were a question between no preamble and a preamble, there is good reason to doubt which would be proper.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is that question.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand the question now is between one and the other; an amendment is proposed to the preamble reported by the House. Now, sir, what is the principle of legislation? When we legislate simply in a legislative act, we do not ordinarily accompany the act with the reasons for it. The reasons are supposed to lie in the mind of the legislator; they are the current events of the times; they are the history out of which the law grows; they are all the surrounding circumstances, if you please, which accompany the act and which induce the act. Now, is that this case? Is this a legislative act having the force of law? I understand it is. It is not a mere declaration; it is not a mere resolution of this body; but it is a legislative act of the highest legislative tribunal in the land; it is designed to have the force of law; and the ground that we put it on is that it is necessary to put this State in its practical relations with the Government of the United States. That is our ground. That is the ground on which the committee report it.

Sir, as a legislative act ordinarily you do not accompany it with your reasons. It is not necessary, I need not say, to give it legislative force; and that is not the legislative propriety of the thing, either. The legislative propriety of the thing is, that you make your law to meet the exigency, and your justification rests in the history of the times, not in the reasons you proclaim. If that is our condition, the question arises whether it is wise for us to assign the reasons. There are many reasons why I think it would not be; and the chief one is that it is not an ordinary act of legislation to declare your reasons. Others might be assigned why it is not necessary. But there are reasons in this case why it may become necessary for us to assign our reasons; and if we do not assign them we are liable to be misunderstood by those who oppose us. I hear it said in this discussion already—the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] announces it and some others on this side of the Chamber—that they will vote for the declaration that Tennessee is entitled to recognition as a State and to representation, on the ground that she has always been, on the ground that she has never been otherwise than entitled to representation, rebellion, insurrection, war to the contrary notwithstanding; there never was a day or an hour when she was not entitled to recognition as a State. Well, sir, if that is the law—

Mr. BUCKALEW. I beg leave to say that the Senator is imputing to me remarks which were made by other gentlemen.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well, so far as my friend is concerned I withdraw it; but that is the other side of this case. Certain gentlemen are disposed to vote Tennessee in on the ground that she was never out; that she is entitled to have her relations declared to be so because they have never been disrupted; that she is entitled to be represented now because she always was. That is the ground. If that is insisted upon, and there is any danger in the country of our being misrepresented or being misunderstood on that question, then I am in favor of a preamble and the amplest preamble possible, one which shall state the ground and the whole ground precisely on which we admit her.

But if I come to that conclusion, I am not for the preamble which comes from the House at all, because that is inadequate, that is incomplete, that does not assign any particular reason. Why? That simply says she has ratified the constitutional amendment and therefore shall be admitted. I do not go on that ground. I do not admit her simply for that reason, because I am not insensible that if we do that we have established a precedent by which South Carolina if she should ratify this constitutional amendment would come here and demand admission: and when South Carolina comes here I may or may not desire to propound to her certain other questions, to know whether she has a constituency that we can recognize, which is a question lying back of all this that we are considering, and vastly more important than any of the facts indicated in the resolution which comes from the House.

Without arguing this proposition, I think it clear on principle that if you are to have a preamble, you must go for that which is most ample, most complete, most entire, and which embodies the reasons for the legislative act. For that reason I am in favor and shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Judiciary Committee because it embraces the great historical facts on which we legislate. It recites that this State once by the act of Congress was declared to have no relations whatever with the Government; and having established that great fact, it then declares that her people by permission of the Government established a constitution, and the further fact that having established a constitution the people of Tennessee organized a government and elected a Governor, and the further fact that they have ratified the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and therefore put themselves in harmony with Congress.

Now, not to repeat myself, I say I rose simply to remark that upon the question of a preamble I am in favor of the question or none; and as that from the Judiciary Committee is most full and ample I vote for that and will reserve myself upon the question of the adoption of a preamble at all. If that amendment should be adopted, then whether I prefer that preamble or none is a point upon which I do not desire to be committed at this moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand that this question is on substituting the amendment of the Senator from Illinois for the House preamble.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; that is the question.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Creswell, Fessenden, Harris, Howard, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Sherman, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Williams—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Cragin, Dixon, Guthrie, Kirkwood, McDougall, Saulsbury, Stewart, Wright, and Yates—10.

So the amendment, as amended, was rejected.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope that the joint resolution will be reported to the Senate, and that we shall take the vote on concurring in the amendment made to the resolution itself, and upon that question I shall ask for a separate vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is still before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer this amendment to come in at the end of the resolution:

Provided, That this shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State there shall be no denial of the electoral franchise, or of any other rights, on account of color or race, but all persons shall be equal before the law; and the Legislature of the State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the State to this fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of such assent whenever the same shall be adopted, upon the prompt receipt whereof he shall, by proclamation, announce the fact, whereupon, without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, this joint resolution shall take effect.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Is that amendment in order now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 4, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Pomeroy, Sumner, and Wade—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Cowan, Creswell, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—34.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Cragin, Dixon, Guthrie, McDougall, Nye, Saulsbury, Stewart, Wright, and Yates—10.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question now arises, as I understand, upon the preamble to the House resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no question of that kind before the Senate now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. A motion to strike out the preamble is not required, as I understand, but the preamble must be positively adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON. You can amend it or move to strike it out.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But is it necessary to move to strike it out? Must not the vote of the Senate be taken on the preamble itself?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no question arising on the preamble now. If the Senator desires to strike it out he can make a motion to that effect. The preamble is to be treated as a part of the resolution. The resolution proper comes up first, and afterward the preamble. We have considered the resolution, and are now considering the preamble.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What I wish to inquire is, whether it is necessary to take a vote of the Senate upon the preamble.

Several SENATORS. Move to strike it out.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not desire to move to strike it out if the question necessarily comes before the Senate on the adoption of the preamble. Is not that the case? ["Oh, no."] Then I move to strike out the preamble of the House resolution.

Mr. COWAN. I call for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary read the preamble proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

Whereas the State of Tennessee has in good faith ratified the article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the Legislatures of the several States, and has also shown to the satisfaction of Congress, by a proper spirit of obedience in the body of her people, her return to her due allegiance to the Government, laws, and authority of the United States: Therefore.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall vote to strike out this preamble. I think we had better have no preamble unless we have one that is full. The Senate has decided not to have one that is full or fuller, and this is imperfect. I think we had better strike it out, and then I shall be willing to adopt the House resolution pretty much as it stands without any preamble. The preamble as it is contains a committal, in my judgment, on the part of Congress to recognize any State government which shall adopt the constitutional amendment, and I think there is no necessity for committing ourselves in that way. I have great doubt about the propriety of a preamble at any rate; and I think it would be better to strike it out.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Creswell, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, Sherman, Sprague, Wade, and Williams—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Cragin, Dixon, McDougall, Nye, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Wright—8.

So the motion to strike out the preamble was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I should like to have the resolution read just as it stands.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the United States do hereby recognize the present government of the State of Tennessee as the legitimate government of said State, entitled to all the rights of a State government under the Constitution of the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. The first question is on concurring in the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee instead of the House resolution.

Mr. WILSON. On that question I desire the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope on reflection that the Senate will not concur with the committee in adopting this amendment. On comparing it with the original resolution as it came from the House I am satisfied that the House resolution is much to be preferred; it contains ideas and implications plainly which exist in point of fact, and goes directly to the distinct proposition, for that reason, of admitting its representatives; and therefore, on reflection, it appears to me, although I voted for the amendment in committee, that it is better to adopt the House resolution as it stands. I shall vote, therefore, against concurring in the action of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The expression of the Senate being against any preamble, I like the House resolution, or a portion of the House resolution, better than I do that reported by the committee, and which has been adopted in Committee of the Whole. The report of the Committee on the Judiciary was both a preamble and a resolution, and if nothing is to be adopted but a simple resolution without any preamble, I incline to think that the better course will be to adopt a part of the House resolution. I am not for adopting the whole of it, and shall move at the proper time to strike out a portion of it. The latter part of the House resolution I hope the Senate will strike out when the proper time comes.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only question is upon concurring in the amendment adopted in committee as a substitute for the House resolution.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, and Riddle—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Cragin, Dixon, McDougall, Saulsbury, and Wright—6.

So the amendment was not concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, striking out the preamble to the House resolution.

The amendment was concurred in.

The resolution, as thus amended, was read, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the State of Tennessee is hereby restored to her former proper, practical relations to the Union, and is again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress, duly elected and qualified, upon their taking the oaths of office required by existing laws.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to strike out of the joint resolution all after the word "Union" in the fourth line, being the words "and is again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress duly elected and qualified, upon their taking the oaths of office required by existing laws."

Mr. POMEROY. I move to amend the part proposed to be stricken out, by striking out simply all after the fifth line, namely, the words, "duly elected and qualified, upon their taking the oaths of office required by existing laws."

I think these words are superfluous.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have two objections to this part of the resolution which I propose to strike out. The first is that it is wholly unnecessary. If the State of Tennessee is "restored to her former proper, practical relations to the Union," the right of representation is one of the rights belonging to her, and it is unnecessary to reiterate it, and therefore this language is objectionable in that respect.

But there is another objection, and I wish Senators would turn their attention to it for a moment. The language is, "and is again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress, duly elected and qualified, upon their taking the oaths of office required by existing laws." I will not admit a man who takes the oaths required by existing laws if I know he has been a traitor. It is not for Congress to decide that; it is for the Senate to decide who is entitled to be admitted here on taking the oaths of office. When the State has been restored to its proper relations to the Union, then it is for each House to decide whether the persons claiming seats are entitled to them or not. I ask my friend from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] if Jeff. Davis were to come here to-morrow and agree to take the oaths of office, would he admit him to a seat? And yet that is the way this resolution reads: "is again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress, duly elected and qualified, upon their taking the oaths of office required by existing laws." There is no necessity for these words; they give no force to the law; and I would not tie up my hands in reference to this question. I am told there are men elected to these Houses of Congress who their friends avow are ready to take the oaths of office, that have been connected with the rebellion.

Mr. CRESWELL. They perjure themselves.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would not allow them to be here if the testimony satisfied me that they had been connected with the rebellion, although they took the oath of office; and I do not wish to be committed by voting for any such proposition when there is no necessity for it. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will sustain my motion. There can be no object in having these words in.

Mr. GRIMES. Why not strike out all after the word "Congress," at the end of the fifth line?

Mr. POMEROY. That is my motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not want to specify one particular thing; it looks as if we denied the others. Let me ask the Senator from Iowa what object there is in saying that a State is entitled to representation. Is she not entitled to other rights?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes. As has been well observed, what is the object of the whole proposition?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The object of the whole proposition is to show that there is a State government there restored to her proper relations in the Union; and representation follows.

Mr. GRIMES. The question we have been investigating all winter is whether there is a State government there entitled to representation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Whether it is entitled to representation is not the question I have been looking at. I have been inquiring whether there is a State government there at all. It is not simply as to representation; it is in reference to the rights pertaining to a State government. When you restore the State of Tennessee to her former proper, practical relations to the Union, representation follows as a matter of course. I do not myself like the title of the resolution and I shall move to amend it at the proper time. It is now "A joint resolution declaring Tennessee again entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress." I want to declare that there is a State government in Tennessee which Congress recognizes as legitimate.

Mr. HOWE. We have struck out that declaration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But we struck that out because the Senator from Wisconsin and others voted against the preamble. He and others, uniting together different sides of the Senate, voted down the preamble; and that having been done, it is better, as I think, to take a part of the House resolution than it is to take the other naked resolution as we reported it.

Mr. POMEROY. If my amendment shall prevail, the language remaining in the resolution will not be subject to the criticism made by the Senator from Illinois. There is something in the point suggested by the Senator from Iowa, that we have been seeking representation from Tennessee all the session. It is not entirely satisfactory to say there is a State government there and stop at that. While we recognize Tennessee as having a State government, I think we ought at least to go so far as to say that she is entitled to be represented in Congress by Senators and Representatives.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not want to say anything about representation in the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There we differ.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It appears to me that there is no necessity for either of these amendments. The resolution only declares a rule of action, and that rule of action is that Tennessee, being entitled again to representation, her Representatives and Senators are to be admitted when they come here duly elected and duly qualified and take the proper oaths. It leaves the constitutional tribunals of this Government the ultimate power of deciding who are elected, who are qualified, and who do take the necessary oaths; and therefore when a Senator from that State appears here, it is for us, as in every other case, to decide whether he personally is qualified to represent that State; and into that question of qualification there enters necessarily the personal element of hostility or friendship to the Government which makes it fit that he should associate with Senators from other States and have a voice with Senators from other States in the deliberations of this body. The resolution does not declare that any particular Senator or Representative is to be received; it only declares that that State is again practically entitled to be represented by Senators and by Representatives. What Senators and what Representatives, and how qualified, the resolution leaves to each House of Congress to decide, under the Constitution, for itself. Therefore it appears to me to be perfectly plain that there is no danger whatever in the resolution as it stands. It is true, I think, as the Senator from Illinois says, that the legal effect of this resolution would be the same if we simply said that she was restored to her former practical relations; but the people of this country, after this great length of time, want to see something a little more practical themselves. They want to see in black and white that the Senators and Representatives from this State are to be received, and they want to know practically and in words that we mean that. Then do not let us stop on the mere legal effect of the thing, but state in good round English, as the House has done, that her Senators and Representatives, when it appears on proper investigation that they are loyal and fit to be received, shall be.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I concur entirely with the Senator from Vermont in the view which he takes of the clause that is now proposed to be stricken out. The Senator from Illinois tells us that he does not wish to say anything about representation in Congress, but thinks it quite sufficient when the resolution goes so far as to declare that Tennessee is restored to her former practical and proper relations with the Union. Undoubtedly if the resolution stopped there it would imply, of course, the right of Tennessee to send Senators and Representatives to Congress. But I choose to go a little further; and I think the House of Representatives have acted wisely in declaring in this resolution, by a strong implication, that the State of Tennessee, in consequence of having gone into the insurrection, had forfeited her right to send Senators and Representatives to Congress, and that is fairly the implication from the language, which is that the State is "again entitled to be represented." I like that language. It corresponds exactly with my idea of the status of Tennessee during the rebellion and up to this time. It implies that there was a period in which the State of Tennessee has not been entitled to send Senators and Representatives to Congress. That has been the doctrine upon which Congress has proceeded all along; it is the doctrine of the act of 1861 giving to the President authority to declare certain States and parts of States in insurrection against the Government. It is a recognition of the clear principle of law; in other words, that by waging war against the United States in the form of a State organization, and in a State the majority of whose citizens have joined in that insurrection, upholding the insurrectionary government, the State has forfeited, for the time being at least, all its political rights as a State of the Union. If it has so forfeited them, then whose duty is it to restore those rights, to remove that forfeiture? The duty of Congress very plainly, the law-making power which declared the insurrection to exist. It is the duty of Congress to restore those rights. I therefore shall vote against the amendment which is offered by the Senator from Illinois. I wish to see this principle clearly recognized in our legislation that a war by a State of the Union against the United States operates as a forfeiture of its political rights as a member of the Union, and constitutes it an enemy of the United States.

During this period of forfeiture, therefore, Mr. President, the State has no right to send Representatives or Senators to Congress; and it is the right and the duty of Congress in the shape of a general statute to declare when this forfeiture shall be removed, and by what means it shall be removed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Had she any rights as a State?

Mr. HOWARD. No rights as a State of the Union whatever; she was not a State in the Union.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Michigan will then allow me to inquire, why specify one right that she lost when she lost all?

Mr. HOWARD. I have said already that in strict, legal construction these words are perhaps not necessary; but they are cumulative in their effect, and they serve to carry out plainly to the mind of the people the idea which has governed Congress all along, that there has been a forfeiture of the right of representation in the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does it not carry an implication that they have forfeited no other right?

Mr. HOWARD. I think it does not. I think that would be rather a strict and, perhaps, illiberal construction to place upon the language. There is no exclusion of one. The language is very plain; the words are "is again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress."

Mr. TRUMBULL. That includes one thing; does it not exclude the others?

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir. That is a principle which, let me say to the Senator, it is not safe to carry out in all cases, and a principle which does not apply except in particular cases: inclusio unius est exclusio alterius. It is rather a dangerous principle of construction. Here the language is used plainly as explanatory and in elucidation of the more general terms which precede it. That is the only light in which I can view it. I prefer, therefore, to retain that language.

As to the other objection that the remaining clause in these words, "duly elected and qualified, upon their taking the oaths of office required by existing laws," might be construed as a pledge on the part of Congress that even Jefferson Davis, if he should be sent here as a Senator or Representative and should offer to take the oaths, would be entitled to take his seat, I see no force whatever in that objection. The persons who are to come here under this statute must be in the first place duly elected; that is, elected by a Legislature recognized to be a State Legislature by act of Congress; secondly, he must be duly qualified; that is, he must possess those qualifications required by the Constitution, and without which his election is void.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Age and citizenship?

Mr. HOWARD. He must have the age and citizenship required—

Mr. POMEROY. I submit to the Senator from Michigan whether those are not questions devolving upon each House and not questions for Congress to decide. That is the reason why I move to strike out the last two lines.

Mr. HOWARD. I will come to that directly.

Mr. POMEROY. The last two lines pertain exclusively to the question of election and of qualification, and should be taken out of the language of the act of Congress.

Mr. HOWARD. "And upon their taking the oaths of office required by existing laws." Very well, can any member of this body or of the House of Representatives take a seat in either of the bodies without taking the oath prescribed by the existing laws? Certainly the Senator from Illinois will not contend that he can do so. They must necessarily take the oaths; and if we still insist upon the test oath, as I trust we shall for all future time, a Senator here or a Representative in the other body cannot obtain his seat there without taking the test oath. It is objected again that this is an assumption on the part of Congress to pass upon the qualifications of the members of the House of Representatives; and that it is not competent for us to assume the authority which, under the Constitution, pertains exclusively to each House. No one pretends that Congress, as a legislative body, can usurp or exercise authority which the Constitution gives to the respective Houses. We may say what we please in a statute in regard to the election and returns of members to the two Houses, still we know that the Constitution, which is the highest law of the land, gives absolutely to each House the right to judge for itself of the elections and qualifications of the members who are returned to it; and it would be the last thing that would occur to my mind, I must confess, that this clause of the joint resolution could be tortured into a pledge or undertaking on the part of Congress or an assumption on the part of Congress to pass upon the questions of the elections and qualifications of the members of the several Houses. Certainly it cannot possibly have any such effect, and it is not contemplated by the resolution itself. All that the resolution requires is that the State of Tennessee shall have the right to send Senators and Representatives to Congress, and that they shall be entitled to take their seats here upon undergoing the tests which exist by the Constitution and laws in regard to their fitness to take those seats; and with this I am content, I confess.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator from Illinois will strike out the last two lines simply, all after the word "Congress," I should vote for his proposed amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. That is the pending motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I will vote for that, because I think those words are unnecessary and might lead to an implication to which I should not agree; and we get all we want by striking out all after the word "Congress" in the fifth line. I am not for retaining the previous words on the ground assumed by my friend from Michigan that amplification is useful. I think that amplification is the curse of this body. We have been amplifying all day on matters that are familiar to us as our fingers; and I think it about time that we take a vote. I do not want to amplify any more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What has become of my motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has voted to amend it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment proposing to strike out the sixth and seventh lines of the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is not the question on striking out all after the word "Congress?"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The effect of the amendment, as amended, if agreed to, will be to strike out all after the word "Congress," at the end of the fifth line.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the "ayes" having risen to be counted,

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a misunderstanding here in regard to the question. The Senator from Illinois moved to strike out all after the word "Union." Then the Senate, on the motion of the Senator from Kansas, struck out all after the word "Congress."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. The Senator from Illinois proposed to strike out all after the word "Union." The Senator from Kansas proposed to amend the amendment by striking out, instead of what the Senator from Illinois proposed, the sixth and seventh lines, and the Senate agreed to that amendment to the amendment; so that the amendment as now amended, if agreed to, will strike out the sixth and seventh lines only.

Mr. BROWN. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. This amendment, if it prevails, as I understand, will strike out a portion of the fourth line after the word "Union" and all of the fifth line.

Mr. SPRAGUE. That is it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This motion, if it prevails, will strike out, as the Chair has repeatedly stated, the sixth and seventh lines, and nothing else.

Mr. GRIMES. Then what did we do when we adopted the amendment of the Senator from Kansas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. You excluded the fifth line and a part of the fourth line from the motion to strike out.

The question being taken by yeas and nays; resulted—yeas 25, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Connors, Davis, Fessenden, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Pomeroy, Riddle, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Cowan, Creswell, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Grimes, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Ramsey, Sprague, Williams, and Yates—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Dixon, Hendricks, Saulsbury, and Wright—4.

So the motion to strike out prevailed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I preferred the resolution as it came from the House; but as the preamble is stricken out and there is now no preamble, I move that this be inserted as a preamble:

Whereas the State of Tennessee has in good faith, by the action of her people, now placed herself in obedience to and in harmony with the Constitution, laws, and authority of the United States: Therefore.

On this I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend that proposed preamble by striking out the word "now."

The amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on the preamble proposed by Mr. SHERMAN, the yeas and nays were taken with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cowan, Fessenden, Grimes, Harris, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, and Stewart—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Connors, Creswell, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Poland, Riddle, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Dixon, Saulsbury, and Wright—4.

So the proposed preamble was rejected.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will now again offer in the Senate the preamble which was offered in the committee, in order to have a distinct vote upon it. Since it was voted upon in committee the preamble of the House has been voted down. I now offer the preamble which came from the Judiciary Committee in the form in which it was altered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the reading of it. The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

Whereas in the year 1861 the government of the State of Tennessee was seized upon and taken possession of by persons in hostility to the United States, and the inhabitants of said State in pursuance of an act of Congress were declared to be in a state of insurrection against the United States; and whereas said State government can only be restored to its former political relations in the Union by the consent of the law-making power of the United States; and whereas the people of said State did, on the 22d day of February, 1865, by a large popular vote, adopt and ratify a constitution of government whereby slavery was abolished and all ordinances and laws of secession and debts contracted under the same were declared void; and whereas a State government has been organized under said constitution which has ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery, also the amendment proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and has done other acts proclaiming and denoting loyalty: Therefore.

Mr. TRUMBULL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois by inserting the preamble which has come from the House of Representatives in lieu of his.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have just voted that down in the Senate, the very same thing that the Senator offers. I apprehend that it is not in order to move that again unless it is altered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order. It presents the question to the Senate, which of the two preambles they will take. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that will not be agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand now the proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island is to offer the House preamble as a substitute for the preamble reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. We have then the choice between the two. I shall vote for the House preamble, and then, if that is voted down, I shall vote for the other.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am sorry that the Senator from Rhode Island should have offered this amendment. I had been desirous to get a distinct vote on the preamble as it was amended in the Senate, coming from the Judiciary Committee. We have been unable to get a distinct vote upon it, because, when it was offered before, it was antagonized with this. Now the Senator from Rhode Island, when it is offered in the Senate, proposes what the Senate voted down in the Senate. My proposition has never been voted upon in the Senate; and why will not the Senator from Rhode Island let us take a distinct vote to see whether the Senate will not adopt it? If we do not, then try the other. Let us have a distinct vote whether we will have this as the preamble or not, without antagonizing it with the House preamble.

Mr. SHERMAN. There has been no vote on the House preamble.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Directly on the House preamble.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not by yeas and nays.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes; by yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the only vote that was taken was on the proposition of the Senator from Illinois to strike out the House preamble and insert that of the committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Ohio listen to me for a moment? When we came into the Senate a distinct vote was taken on agreeing to the preamble of the House by yeas and nays, and it was voted down.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amendment which I offer now as a preamble has never been offered in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. The yeas and nays were not called on the House preamble.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I undertake to say it was voted on by yeas and nays, and I ask the President of the Senate to report the vote on the distinct House preamble by itself. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] made the motion to strike out the House preamble, and we took a distinct vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No vote has been taken upon this preamble since we adopted the House resolution. Since that vote was taken, to which the gentleman refers, we have adopted the House resolution; and now the simple question is presented as to whether we shall take the preamble of the House with the House resolution; that is the question now.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin offered his amendment in Committee of the Whole, and not in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state, for the information of the Senate, that in Committee of the Whole it was moved to strike out the House preamble and insert the preamble of the Judiciary Committee; that failed to carry. Afterward it was moved in the Committee of the Whole by the Senator from Wisconsin to strike out the House preamble, which carried.

Mr. TRUMBULL. By yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By yeas and nays; and after we came into the Senate it was concurred in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It has been concurred in by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois; and upon that the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would prefer, if we can do it, to have separate votes; and if it is in my power to do so I will withdraw my amendment, so that we may take a direct vote on agreeing to the House preamble, as the Senator from Rhode Island proposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HENDERSON. I object.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well; let us have the vote, then, on the House proposition. I trust the Senate will vote down the House preamble, in order that we may take a direct vote on the other.

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Creswell, Edmunds, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Kirkwood, Norton, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Guthrie, Howard, Howe, Lane, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Dixon, Saulsbury, and Wright—4.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The question is on the preamble I offer.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask that it be read.

Several SENATORS. It has been read over and over again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read, if desired.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire it.

The Secretary read the proposed preamble, as follows:

Whereas in the year 1861, the government of the State of Tennessee was seized upon and taken possession of by persons in hostility to the United States, and the inhabitants of said State, in pursuance of an act of Congress, were declared to be in a state of insurrection against the United States; and whereas said State government can only be restored to its former political relations in the Union by the consent of the law-making power of the United States; and whereas the people of said State did on the 22d of February, 1865, by a large popular vote adopt and ratify a constitution of government whereby slavery was abolished, and all ordinances and laws of secession and debts contracted under the same were declared void; and whereas a State government has been organized under said constitution which has ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery, also the amendment proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and has done other acts proclaiming and denoting loyalty: Therefore,

Mr. BROWN. I desire simply to say, in this connection, that I find nothing in that preamble that will elucidate my vote on the resolution when it comes up, and as I am opposed to any preamble at all events, I shall vote against the amendment.

The vote being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Creswell, Fessenden, Harris, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Van Winkle, and Willey—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Dixon, Grimes, Saulsbury, and Wright—5.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I propose to amend in the third and fourth lines as follows: in the third line strike out the words "is hereby" and insert "shall be held;" and in the fourth line strike out the words "is again;" so as to read, "the State of Tennessee shall be held restored to her former proper, practical relations to the Union, and entitled to be represented."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. YATES. I offer this as an amendment to the resolution as it has been amended, to come in at the end of the fifth line:

Who possess the qualifications required by the article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the Legislatures of the several States, and have been duly elected and qualified, upon taking the oaths of office required by existing laws.

I simply desire to say that this amendment provides that those who are excluded from holding office by the proposed amendment to the Constitution shall not be Senators or Representatives, and that Senators and Representatives shall take the oath prescribed by existing laws. This, as I understand it, meets the objection of my colleague upon this point. By the proposed amendment to the Constitution certain men are excluded from holding office, those who, having taken an oath to support the Constitution heretofore, have violated that oath. This amendment of mine, that if the Senators and Representatives from Tennessee possess the qualifications required by that constitutional amendment, and then also take the oath of office, they may be admitted as Senators and Representatives. Very unwillingly did I consent to strike out of the resolution, whether it is material or immaterial, the provision that these Senators and Representatives should be required to take the oath of office prescribed by existing laws, because I wish it to be understood that they must take the test oath, however disagreeable it may be to them. My amendment simply provides that they shall take this oath, and that they shall be men who are entitled to hold office according to the amendment to the Constitution which we have proposed to be adopted by the different States. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that this amendment ought not to be adopted or rejected without consideration. It proposes, as I understand, to make a rule in a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States which has not yet been adopted and has no force whatever, a rule by which the representation of the State of Tennessee is to be governed. In the second place, that part of the proposed amendment, it seems to me, is entirely useless, because no person under existing laws can be a Senator or Representative in Congress without taking the oath which the law prescribes; and he must commit perjury if he takes that oath if he has been one of the persons designated in this proposed amendment, that is, one who has held office under the confederate government. It seems to me that to adopt this amendment at this time without any consideration as to its effect would be rather a rash step, and I shall vote against it.

Mr. HARRIS. I regard these questions that we are passing upon now as of greater importance than anything we have had before the Senate for a long while; and I am satisfied that we are not likely to arrive at any wise conclusion this evening. I think we had better think over this thing and deliberate upon it. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas 20, nays 23.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. YATES.]

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to state that I have paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who has been called out of the Chamber.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Edmunds, Howard, Lane, Nye, Pomeroy, Sprague, Wade, and Yates—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Creswell, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Kirkwood, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Dixon, Johnson, Morrill, Saulsbury, and Wright—6.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COWAN. I propose to amend as follows: strike out the preamble and in the first line all after the word "Senate," and in the second line all after the words "United States of America," and substitute for the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh lines these words: "that the Senators-elect from the State of Tennessee, the honorable Messrs. Fowler and Patterson, be admitted to qualify and take their seats in the Senate as Senators from that State." If thus amended, the resolution would read in this wise:

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States of America, That the Senators-elect from the State of Tennessee, the honorable Messrs. Fowler and Patterson, be admitted to qualify and take their seats in the Senate as Senators from that State.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is that in order to a joint resolution?

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment cannot be in order.

Mr. COWAN. I wish to be heard upon that. The House resolution, although it is called a joint resolution, is not a joint resolution. If it is anything at all it is a concurrent resolution. A resolution cannot be a joint resolution or a concurrent resolution merely because you write at the head of it the word "joint" or "concurrent." The resolution takes its character from the subject-matter of it and the breadth of its operation. Now, it is perfectly evident that what we want to get at here is the admission of Senators and Representatives from Tennessee. The operation of this joint resolution, as it is called, can possibly go no further; it can have no operation outside of that. The only conceivable result which will follow from it will be that Representatives will be admitted into the other House and Senators will be admitted here. That is the whole of it.

Another and more complete test of its concurrent nature, and not its joint character, is the fact that if it were proposed to the President for his veto or approval, it would not make a particle of difference whether he approved or whether he vetoed it, because if he vetoed it we could proceed immediately to do all that is contemplated under the resolution the same as though he approved it. His veto amounts to nothing one way or the other. The fashion of calling things joint resolutions when you want to present them to the President and when you want to make a point by asking him to sign something he does not want to sign and when you expect to make a little capital by putting him into a dilemma, and calling them concurrent resolutions when you do not want the President to sign them or have anything to do with them—I say that practice and that species of trickery ought now to be abandoned, I think.

Mr. LANE. I rise to a point of order. What is the question before the Senate? The amendment which the Senator moved has been ruled out of order. No appeal from the decision of the Chair has been taken; and yet a lengthy argument going on.

Mr. COWAN. I do not understand the Chair to have decided peremptorily that it was out of order. I asked to be heard upon the question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will pause. The Senator from Indiana raises the point of order that after the question of order has been decided, it is not in order for the Senator from Pennsylvania to debate the question. That point of order is well taken. The Senator from Pennsylvania can only proceed by the indulgence of the Senate, and if the Senator from Indiana objects it cannot be.

Mr. LANE. I object to any further debate.

Mr. COWAN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The last decision or the one before that?

Mr. COWAN. The one before that. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. COWAN. And upon that I can be heard I presume.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Undoubtedly.
